DICTIONARY. The candid reader will ſee that, from the very nature of the deſign, it was almoſt impoſſible to avoid a number of typographical errors, reſpecting the poſition of the figures and accents; the reader, however, will be readily enabled to correct them by comparing the word printed with its accents, and the ſame word printed in ſyllables with its proper figures. When they do not coincide, one of them is wrong; and which of them will be eaſily determined by caſting the eye on the concomitant radical, or its derivatives.

INTRODUCTION.

IT has been remarked as a phænomenon in the literary world, that, while our learned fellow ſubjects of Scotland and Ireland are making frequent attempts to aſcertain, and fix a ſtandard to, the pronunciation of the Engliſh tongue, the natives of England themſelves ſeem to be little anxious either for the honour or improvement of their own language: for ſuch the inveſtigation and eſtabliſhment of a rational criterion of Engliſh orthoepy, muſt certainly be conſidered.

It is indeed more natural for foreigners and provincials to ſee the uſe and neceſſity of ſuch criterion. The natives of a country, and particularly of the metropolis, meet with none of thoſe difficulties, which occur to others. Cuſtom renders every thing eaſy and familiar, nor do they perceive any of thoſe irregularities and apparent improprieties, that ſtrike the ear of ſuch as are accuſtomed to different dialects. At the ſame time, however, that theſe are moſt ſenſible of the difficulties and defects, they are the leaſt qualified to obviate them. There ſeems indeed a moſt ridiculous abſurdity in the pretenſions of a native of Aberdeen or Tipperary, to teach the natives of London to ſpeak and to read.

Various have been nevertheleſs the modeſt attempts of the Scots and Iriſh, to eſtabliſh a ſtandard of Engliſh pronunciation. That they ſhould not have ſucceeded is no wonder. Men cannot teach others what they do not themſelves know: nay had theſe enterprizing geniuſes been qualified in point of knowledge, they ſeem to have been generally deficient in that of ingenuity; the methods, moſt of them have hit upon, being but ill calculated to anſwer the end propoſed.

The expedient, moſt generally adapted, hath been that of endeavouring to expreſs the ſounds of ſyllables, by varying their orthography, or ſpelling them in a different manner. On this plan we have vocabularies, containing all the words in our language, ſo horribly metamorphoſed as to be equally unintelligible both to the eye and ear. A native of England will hardly believe it poſſible that, any of theſe refined judges of our language ſhould direct the reader to pronounce the vowels a, e, i, o, u, y, as if they were ſyllables ſpelt thus, ai, ee, awee, o, eu, wy. Yet ſuch is the caſe. But the abſurdity, of attempting to convey ſounds merely by letters, and teaching the pronunciation of words by a different mode of ſpelling, will appear flagrant from the following ſpecimen of a ſentence or two ſo ſpelt and printed.

Eezy poeetry iz that in wheetſh nateuril thots air expreſſed without violinſs too the langwidſh. Thee diſkriminaiting kariktir ov eez konſiſts prinſipilly in the dikſhun, for awl trew poeetry reequirs that thee ſentimints bee nateuril. Langwidſh ſuffirs violinſs by harſh or by dairing figurs, by unſhootibl tranſpozeeſhun, by uneuzyl akſeptaiſhuns ov wurdz, and any liſins wheetſh wood bee avoided by a ritir ov proz.

In this manner would a paſſage in Dr. Johnſon's Idler * be ſpelt, according to the inſtructions given, and the nomenclature printed, in a late "Eſſay towards eſtabliſhing a ſtandard for an elegant and uniform pronunciation of the Engliſh language; addreſſed to the two auguſt houſes of the Britiſh parliament." †

The Engliſh reader will very readily diſcover, in attempting to decypher the above paſſage, that the eſſayiſt muſt be a North-Briton, and not a native of England. Admitting however that he had been capable of giving every word its true ſound, this method of diſfiguring the orthography is very prejudicial to the learner; who, in thus being taught to ſpeak and read, will forget, or never learn, how to write: an accurate method of ſpelling words being attained chiefly by reading books correctly printed; in which the word is literally preſented in its due proportion of number and character to the eye. This is evident from ſlips of the pen and errors of the preſs; in which the diſtortion of the word is noticed at firſt ſight, and the ſpelling known to be wrong, before its particular redundance or deficience be determined. I would, for this reaſon, were there no other, baniſh this prejudicial contrivance from all attempts to teach the pronunciation of our language. But there is another reaſon and a very cogent one reſpecting foreigners; which is that, though they uſe the ſame letters and combinations of letters, they have not always the ſame force in different languages; ſo that, ſup-

poſing the Engliſh, Scots and Iriſh might be a little benefited by this practice, our neighbours on the continent would be only the more embarraſſed by it. A very few inſtances may ſerve to illuſtrate this point. It is notorious that the French and Dutch do not pronounce the Theta of the Greeks, as the Engliſh do; who pronounce the Latin alſo different from moſt other nations. The word Cœcus, for inſtance they pronounce Sekus; while the Italians pronounce it as if written Chekous. In the German and its various dialects the G, ſo very hard in ſome Engliſh words, is little more than an aſpirate. Nor is this only the caſe with the conſonants: the vowel o as it is ſounded open in ore, pore, &c. is expreſſed in Low Dutch by the double oo; whilſt the Engliſh ſound of the double oo, as in good, poor, &c. is expreſſed in Dutch by oe, as in goed, boer, which they pronounce as we do good, boor; except indeed with a little variation as to the d in the former word; which has the force of a t.

The celebrated Mr. Sheridan has avoided falling into this erroneous practice, and very judiciouſly propoſes to diſtinguiſh the ſound of words by certain typographical marks to be placed over particular ſyllables. It is indeed probable that, if this gentleman had carried his plan into execution, he would have ſuperſeded the preſent work; as, whatever defects there appeared to me in his deſign, it is poſſible he might have himſelf corrected them in its proſecution; and it is natural to imagine that a writer, who applies himſelf ſolely to a particular ſtudy, will make a greater progreſs than one who, amidſt a variety of avocations, can make it only a partial object of his attention. It was indeed with a view rather of ſerving a certain teacher in the way of his profeſſion, than from any expectation of credit to myſelf that I engaged in this work; the original proprietor of which, the late Mr. Jacob Tonſon being ſince dead, I have been induced, in juſtice to his aſſigns, to publiſh in my own name, what was projected chiefly for the emolument of another. The deſign, however, I am by no means aſhamed of, and, though its execution ſhould be thought, by the learned, to fall ſhort of the point of exactitude to which it might be carried, I flatter myſelf it will be found of general utility, reſpecting the practical purpoſes it was intended to anſwer.

As this work is not deſigned to ſerve as a gloſſary of obſolete or technical terms, ſuch words are purpoſely omitted as are not of modern and elegant uſe. As it is alſo more particularly calculated to aſcertain the method of ſpeaking than of writing, the reader will find it neceſſary to attend to the following inſtructions, in order to conſult it with profit and propriety.

DIRECTIONS FOR CONSULTING THE FOLLOWING DICTIONARY.

The Reader will, at firſt ſight, obſerve that, in order to aſcertain the pronunciation of our language, a peculiar method is taken in the mode of printing this work; each radical word and principal derivative being firſt printed with its reſpective accent or accents, placed over the proper ſyllables; and then reprinted in ſeparate ſyllables with figures placed over each ſyllable to determine the exact quality of ſound to be given it. Add to this, that the conſonants are printed in Roman or Italic characters, as they take their hard or ſoft ſound, are audible or mute.

With reſpect to accent, it is to be remarked that, we have in Engliſh two modes of laying a forcible ſtreſs on particular ſyllables: the one by pronouncing them ſharp and quick, the other by pronouncing them flat and ſlow.

Our lexicographers however have neglected to make any diſtinction in the marks, by which they have been pointed out; uſing the mark of the acute accent only in both caſes: a circumſtance which has been greatly perplexing to foreigners, and that the more eſpecially as moſt of our Grammarians abſurdly tell them, that the accent always makes the ſyllable, over which it is placed, long.

In the preſent work, therefore, theſe different modes of accentuation are pointed out, by the uſe of the different marks of the grave and acute; the former being placed, thus [`] over the flat and ſlowly accented ſyllables; and the acute, thus [´] over the ſharp and quickly accented. By this diſtinction the reader is informed, at ſight, not only of the moſt accuſtomed and elegant method of laying the ſingle accent on words of two and three ſyllables, but alſo of laying two, three or even more accents, as is frequently required, in the proper pronunciation of polyſyllables.

The poſition and quality of the accent, an eſſential point in ſpeaking Engliſh, being thus determined; the preciſe and diſtinct ſound and mode of articulating each ſyllable, are next pointed out, by the reprinting of the words, divided into ſyllables, not after any abſurd and arbitrary rules, deduced from the proſody of the dead languages, but from the actual practice of the beſt ſpeakers; men of letters in the metropolis.

To effect this purpoſe it was neceſſary to inveſtigate all the different ſounds and modes of articulation, made uſe of in the Engliſh tongue; which are accordingly diſcriminated in the following tables.

TABLE

TABLE OF ENGLISH SOUNDS, OR VOWELS,

Expreſſed in different Syllables by various Letters.

No. 1. Example. Cur, ſir, her, monk, blood, earth, &c.
2. Ex. Town, noun, how, bough.
3. Ex. Bull, wool, wolf, puſh.
4. Ex. Pool, groupe, troop.
5. Ex. Call, hawl, caul, ſoft, oft, George, cloth.
6. Ex. New, cube, duty, beauty.
7. Ex. Not, what, gone, ſwan, war, was.
8. Ex. No, beau, foe, moan, blown, roan.
9. Ex. Boy, joy, toil.
10. Ex. Hard, part, carve, laugh, heart.
11. Ex. And, hat, crag, bar.
12. Ex. Bay, they, weigh, fail, tale.
13. Ex. Met, ſweat, head, bread.
14. Ex. Meet, meat, deceit.
15. Ex. Fit, yes, buſy, women, Engliſh, guilt.
16. Ex. Why, nigh, I, buy, join, lyre, hire, &c. &c.

Add to the above the indiſtinct ſound, marked with a cypher thus [o], as practiſed in the colloquial utterance of the particles a and the, the laſt ſyllables of words ending in en, le, and re; as a garden, the caſtle, &c. alſo in the ſyllable frequently ſunk in the middle of words of three ſyllables, as every, memory, favourite, &c. which are in verſification ſometimes formally omitted in writing, by the mark of eliſion.

Under one or other of the numbers compoſing the above table, are comprehended all the ſpecies of diſtinct articulate ſounds contained in the Engliſh language. Not that they differ altogether equally in quality; ſeveral differing only in time. There are no more than eleven diſtinct vocal ſounds of different qualities in Engliſh; ten of the numbers ſpecified in the table being expreſſed by the long and and ſhort modes of uttering our five vowels; as exemplified in the following words.

A.	ſhort in	barr'd.	long in	bard.
E.		met.		mate.
I.		hit.		heat.
O.		not.		naught.
U.		pull.		pool.

The

The other ſix ſounds are either always ſhort as u in cur, or always long as o in note, or diphthongal or double as i or y in hire, lyre; u in lure; ow in town and oi in joy: moſt of which long ſounds ſeem to partake of two qualities, not ſo equally blended in them all, as to paſs without our perceiving the ingredients of the compound. Thus I or Y appear to be a commixture of the long e and ſhort i; U of the long e and ſhort u; OW of the ſhort o and long u; and OI moſt palpably of the ſhort o and i.

With regard to the modes of articulation, or Conſonants, as they are not always indicated by the ſame letters; many letters anſwering to two different modes of articulation, and ſome of them being ſometimes audible and at others quite mute; they are in this dictionary printed ſometimes in Roman, and at others in Italic characters, to point out that difference.

TABLE OF MODES OF ARTICULATION OR CONSONANTS.

C hard, as in can, could, capſtain.
C ſoft, as in ceaſe, citizen, chaiſe.
G hard, as in get, give.
G ſoft, as in gentleman, giant: alſo when it is quite mute in the middle of words, as in ſign, benign, &c.
GH audible, as in laugh, rough.
GH mute, as in night, right, high, nigh.
I for Y, as in onion, chriſtian, poniard, queſtion, opinion.
U for W, as in almoſt all caſes when it follows Q, and frequently when it follows G. Example, Equity, Linguiſt.
X ſharp, like ks, as in Alexander, expand.
X flat, like gz, as in example, exact.
TH hard, as in thin, cloth, mouth.
TH ſoft, as in thou, cloathe, mouthe.
TI, CI, CE, } ſharp, like ſh, as in nation, patient, ſocial, ocean.
SI, SU, } flat, like zhu, as in boſier, occaſion, meaſure, leiſure.

All

All the other conſonants when printed in Italics are mute or ſilent, as B in debt, K in know, H in hour, heir, honeſt, thyme. P. in ptiſan, &c. except PH, which ſounds like F when printed in Italics or, as in a few inſtances, like V.

The uſe of theſe tables will be ſufficiently illuſtrated by the following examples. We will ſuppoſe the true pronunciation were required of the words Faſcination and Oppoſition.

On turning to the word Faſcination in the dictionary, we find it printed firſt with its two accents, the acute and the grave; the firſt on the firſt ſyllable and the ſecond on the third, thus [FA'SCINA'TION]; from which it appears that the firſt ſyllable is to be ſharply and quickly accented or forcibly pronounced; and the third to be flatly and ſlowly accented.—The word is next printed, as it is divided into ſyllables according to a right pronunciation, with figures placed over each ſyllable, to determine its exact ſound, as the figures correſpond with thoſe of the above table of ſounds: thus $^{11}_{\text{FAS-}}$ $^{15}_{\textit{CI-}}$ $^{12}_{\text{NA-}}$ $^{1}_{\textit{TION}}$.]

Now, by referring to the table, we find that the ſeveral ſyllables are to be pronounced like the words placed over againſt the numbers 11, 15, 12, 1; by which the quality of the ſound, or the power of all the vowels, is exactly determined.

By ſhewing farther that the conſonant C in the ſecond ſyllable is printed in Italicks, it is known, by the table of conſonants, that it is here pronounced ſoft like an S. Again, the letters TI in the laſt ſyllable being alſo printed in Italics, it is plain from the ſame table that they have the uſual power of ſh; ſo that the word muſt be pronounced as if it had been printed $^{11}_{\text{FAS-}}$ $^{15}_{\text{SI-}}$ $^{12}_{\text{NA-}}$ $^{1}_{\text{SHON}}$.

The word Oppoſition is firſt printed with its two accents, on the firſt and third ſyllables: but theſe, being both acute, are to be ſharply and quickly pronounced in the very ſame manner. And here it may not be improper to remark, that the acute accent always includes the concluding conſonant; the accented ſyllable ever ending with a conſonant: whereas the ſyllable marked with the grave accent always ends with a vowel.

The accents of the word being thus marked, it is reprinted as properly ſpelt, thus; $^{7}_{\text{OP-}}$ $^{7}_{\text{PO-}}$ $^{15}_{\textit{SITI-}}$ $^{1}_{\text{ON}}$. The figures placed at top of each ſyllable, being referred to the table, as in the foregoing caſe, ſhew the ſounds of the ſyllables; while the letters S and TI in the third ſyllable being printed in Italics, indicate they are to have the force of z and ſh, ſo that the word is to be pronounced as if printed $^{7}_{\text{OP-}}$ $^{7}_{\text{PO-}}$ $^{15}_{\text{ZISH-}}$ $^{1}_{\text{ON}}$. The ſpeaker therefore, who, obſerving theſe rules, ſhould, to a due obſervation of the true ſound of the ſyllables, add the true force of the different accents, would neceſſarily pronounce all Engliſh words with propriety.

Foreigners indeed may find ſome little difficulty in acquiring the method of forming all the above ſounds and modes of articulation; but, if they pay any degree of attention to the rules laid down in the following grammar, and the ſimilarity there pointed out between the ſounds of the Engliſh and other European languages, that difficulty will ſoon be obviated. At worſt they have only to learn by practice from the mouth of almoſt any native, two or three articulations, and about as many ſounds which are not in their own language. This may be effected in a ſhort time with eaſe, as hath been experienced by the author in the caſe of a number of foreigners of different countries, as well as of the natives of Scotland and Ireland, and the provincials of Wales, Yorkſhire and Cornwall.

In the orthographical part of this dictionary, there will be noticed a little ſingularity in the mode of ſpelling ſome words ending in c or ck; as lunatic and lunatick which, for diſtinction ſake merely, I ſpell with a c when they are adjectives, and with ck when they are ſubſtantives.

With reſpect to the etymology, explanation of words, and illuſtration of idiom and phraſeology, the reader will find that I have generally followed the celebrated dictionary of the learned Dr. Johnſon. As the preſent performance is chiefly calculated to correct and aſcertain the orthoepy of our tongue, I thought it might be of ſome advantage to its readers, to make it at the ſame time a copious index to a work of very general acceptation, in which the literal authorities, collected from our beſt writers, may be conſulted at large.

A RHE-

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

CHAP. I.

On Languages in general, and the English Tongue in particular.

SECTION I.

Of Language, or Speech, in general.

SPEECH, ſay the Divines, is the gift of God. It undoubtedly is ſo; as he hath given mankind the faculties and talents of attaining it: but a philoſopher, employed in the inveſtigation of ſecond cauſes, who would trace the riſe and progreſs of human attainments, ſhould conſider it as an art, which has been gradually improved, from the rudeſt efforts of ſimple nature, to its preſent degree of artificial perfection.

The means of communicating human knowledge is, like that knowledge itſelf, the work of ages. Till the mind became furniſhed with ideas, it formed not the deſign of communicating them. Profound ignorance hath no uſe for ſpeech: the birds of the air and the beaſts of the field have neither Grammar nor Rhetoric. This is the prerogative of man, who, in proportion as he acquired knowledge added to his vocabulary, and as he improved in the aſſociation and combination of his ideas, improved alſo the matter and modification of his language.

The matter of language is of two kinds, vocal and literal; the elements and conſtruction of which are totally different, and ſhould be conſidered apart, if we would enter into the true ſpirit, and develope the principles, of their connection.

The material elements of vocal language are ſounds, which ſpeak to the ears; thoſe of literal language, written types or figures, which ſpeak to the eyes: ſo that poliſhed nations have in fact two diſtinct kinds of language, which may be called oral and ocular; the properties of which, though arbitrarily connected by uſe, have no natural or phyſical dependance on each other.

As languages were written before they were ſpoken, the elements of oral language, or ſpeech, properly ſo called, preſent themſelves firſt to our conſideration.

SECTION. II.

Of the Elements of Speech, or Oral Language, in particular.

Though ſound be the general elementary matter of ſpeech, every particular ſound is by no means a vocal element. There are a number of ſounds, proceeding from inanimate objects, that are not adopted in any known language, or even adapted to the human organs of utterance. Indeed the ſounds, made uſe of in ſpeech, have but little variety in point of quality: whence it may be inferred that, either the capacity of the organs is very limited; or that ſpeech, though an art, is not a mechanic art, like that of writing, founded on principles of ſcience; but one of thoſe imitative arts that are founded merely on ſimple obſervation. It may indeed admit a doubt, whether the organs of ſpeech are phyſically incapable of a greater variety of ſounds than are known to be hitherto practiſed; but it will admit of none that moſt, if not all, thoſe ſounds really prevail in the different ſpecies of the animal creation: from which therefore it may not be unreaſonably concluded, they were firſt imitated and applied to the purpoſes of ſpeech. As the human organs ſeem not, like thoſe of moſt brutes, confined by nature to a particular ſpecies of ſound, nothing is more natural than to ſuppoſe that, man learned to imitate the ſeveral ſounds of other animals, and even to adopt ſome inanimate ſounds, when the number and diverſity, for which he had a uſe, required it. The vaſt diverſity of combinations which in time became neceſſary, rendered it neceſſary alſo to conſult the eſſential purpoſes of ſpeech, as well on every ſimple mode of ſound, as on every new method of combination.

As the great end of ſpeech is to be intelligible, audibility and preciſion are of courſe its eſſential requiſites. Next to theſe eſſential requiſites are to be conſulted thoſe of convenience and pleaſure; requiring not only force and diſtinctneſs in ſounds; but that, with a facility of pronunciation, they ſhould be likewiſe grateful to the ear. It muſt indeed have been ſoon obſerved that the organs of ſpeech and hearing, bear ſo great an affinity to each other, that ſounds, which are difficult to utter, are alſo diſagreeable to hear.

And yet ſuch is the force of cuſtom, that this difficulty and diſſonance are little perceived by thoſe who are early taught and accuſtomed only to their native tongue. A very little acquaintance with other dialects, will ſerve to prove that ſounds, which appear very uncouth and barbarous to ſome people, are eaſily uttered and pleaſant enough to the ear of others. They who affect therefore to make their own tongue the criterion of Euphony in ſpeech will ever be liable to miſtake. And yet this doth by no means reſolve the whole into caprice, or prove that there is no ſuch criterion. It is univerſally agreed among linguiſts, that the Italian is the moſt pleaſing to the ear of all European Tongues: but the reaſon is not, that it is compoſed of ſounds different from thoſe of other languages; but that it has fewer of thoſe diſagreeable modes of articulation, which ſtill prevail more or leſs in all languages, and are unpleaſant in any. A perſon, who had never ſpoke and had never heard the ſound but of one language, would be at no great loſs to determine what ſounds are the moſt pleaſing in his own. He would be at no loſs to perceive that the guttural and naſal modes of enunciation are leſs pleaſant than the labial and lingual. If then he be informed that the German, French, Engliſh and other European tongues abound more in theſe ſounds than the Italian, he might of courſe give the preference in this reſpect to the latter, though he had never heard a ſyllable of it.

From theſe conſiderations it is evident that, there are rules for the utterance of ſpeech in general, independent of particular languages. It is certain alſo that, although theſe rules have not been much attended to in theory, they have been adopted in practice; the language of every poliſhed nation having been gradually refined, as well by the diſuſe of ill-ſounding words and adoption of others more agreeable to the ear, as by the melioration of the ſounds themſelves; which in the infant ſtate of moſt languages have been diſſonant and barbarous. Not that languages have been improved by every ſuch refinement. On the contrary, for want of a due attention to the theory of ſuch improvements, many languages have loſt in ſtrength what they have gained in ſweetneſs. For a language may as well be too ſmooth and ſibilant as too rough and aſpirate. Audibility is eſſential to ſpeech, nor can any language be too ſonorous while its articulation is diſtinct and clear. A man would not ſpeak ſo loud, or in ſo high a key, in a drawing room as in a wood or in a plain; but the moſt ſonorous language is the moſt eaſily ſpoken and beſt heard even in a whiſper. At the ſame time, it is to be obſerved that the audibility of ſpeech depends equally on the quality as the quantity of ſound. It is in vain that we hear ſounds if they are not diſtinct and intelligible; and they may be rendered equally indiſtinct by too great as by too ſmall an exertion of voice. Diſtinct articulation therefore is the firſt and moſt eſſential part of ſpeech.

Now diſtinct articulation depends on the knowledge and application of the elements, contributing to the formation of ſyllables or articulate ſounds.

The moſt general and ſimple of theſe elements are thoſe vocal ſounds, which I ſuppoſe to have been imitative, and which may be diſtinguiſhed, after the manner of the ancients, as animal voices, in contraſt to, what they called, inanimate ſounds. Theſe however, though abſolutely eſſential, are not the moſt characteriſtic parts of ſpeech. The vowels are ſounded by different animals, which nevertheleſs cannot ſpeak; nay even by automata which do not live.

The more particular and characteriſtical elements of ſpeech are thoſe ſurd modes of articulation, which give a different form, if I may ſo call it, to the ſame ſound; and are uſually called conſonants; a term by which they are denoted not to be entirely mute; although their uſe, in ſonorous and diſtinct articulation requires they ſhould be as little heard as poſſible.

The moſt ſimple and preciſe of theſe ſurd modes are quite mute, and conſiſt ſolely in the poſition and appulſe of the organs at the beginning or cloſe of the vowel. Not that they are equally mute in both caſes. The ſurd mode which obſtructs the vocal at the beginning, neceſſarily ſtopping part of its ſound at the cloſe; in conſequence of which the obſtructed breath iſſues indiſtinctly through whatever aperture remains. Thus a labial, which is mute at the beginning of a word, is frequently naſal or liquid at the end of it. It is the ſame in a greater or leſs degree with all the mute conſonants; which are ſilent before a vowel and gutturals, naſals or palatines after it: that is, they are attended with an indiſtinct ſound formed by reverberation in the throat, or noſe, or againſt the palate.

The other ſurd modes are all attended with a greater or leſs degree of ſuch indiſtinct and toneleſs ſound, independent of their connection with, or relation to, the vowel; always annexing a breathing, hiſſing, or murmuring, ſound to that of the vowel; whether they precede or follow it.

Now, as theſe indiſtinct ſounds tend to obſcure the tone of the vowel, thoſe vowels will ever be the moſt clear and articulate, that are produced without them; and the others more or leſs ſo, in proportion to the quantity and quality of ſuch breathing, hiſſing or murmuring, attendant on the vowel.

It is for this reaſon that the office of the conſonants ſhould be diſcharged as ſoon as poſſible; and not be protracted longer than is neceſſary to give the form to the vowel.

It is indeed on the celerity of utterance that all the difference in many caſes between conſonants and vowels depends; as in the w and y, in Engliſh; which, being diſcharged quickly, perform the office of conſonants, in giving form only to the ſucceeding vowel; but, when protracted or drawled out, acquire a tone and become the vocal oo and ee.

It is for want of paying a due attention to theſe rules, reſpecting articulation in general, that many perſons exaggerate the characteriſtical defects of a language, which are, by a proper articulation in a great degree concealed by others. Thus the dental hiſs of the Engliſh, the guttural growl of the Dutch and naſal twang of the French, are greatly diminiſhed by a quick and ſharp pronunciation; while they are moſt abominably increaſed by a ſlow and flat one.

Thoſe linguiſts therefore, who take ſo much pains to enforce theſe modes of articulation, as being characteriſtical of the different languages, ſhould, at the ſame time, remark that, although this be the real ſtate of the caſe, the prevalence of either of theſe modes in any language, is a characteriſtical defect: that language being not only the moſt articulate, but leaſt offenſive to the ear, in which the different conſonants are moſt equally mixed and blended; and that the moſt pleaſing in which their ſound is leaſt perceptible.

And yet to remove theſe defects intirely, were it poſſible, would be in a great degree to change the language; and therefore an abſurd attempt in thoſe who would inveſtigate, or deſcribe, its preſent ſtate. One thing however is both practical and proper; and that is to point out the circumſtances in which the propriety of articulation conſiſts; by which every language may in time be farther corrected: whereas it is now common for grammarians to propagate, as eſſential beauties in a particular language, thoſe defects, which are diſgaceful to all.

SECTION

SECTION III.

Of Articulation, or the Formation of Syllables.

By a ſyllable I mean an articulate ſound; that is the voice, or a vocal ſound, modified by ſome conſonant or appulſe of the organs of ſpeech. A mere vowel, having no other diſtinction than the quality it acquires by ſimple emiſſion through the mouth, wants that form, which is neceſſary to conſtitute it a compleat articulate ſound, or ſyllable. We do indeed admit ſingle vowels ſometimes to paſs for ſyllables, but they are the moſt equivocal and indeterminate of all others; ever cauſing an hiatus in pronunciation, for want of a formal conſonant.

The great art of articulate pronunciation depending on the clear intonation of the vowel and ſuppreſſing the ſound of the conſonant, nothing can be more neceſſary to propriety of articulation, than to diſtinguiſh between thoſe different modes of enunciation, and to attain the art of ſeparating them with facility in practice. The former is eſſentially neceſſary to the latter. It is alſo the more neceſſary, as being what linguiſts ſeldom teach, and perhaps ſeldom know; nothing being ſo common as to blend the vowel and conſonant ſo intimately together, in ſpeaking, as to be hardly ſeparated by the niceſt ear. Nay the politeſt and beſt ſpeakers of the French tongue maintain that, their naſal ſounds, expreſſed by ain, ein, an, in, are really vowels, and have no formal termination at all. It is certain the Engliſh have not thoſe ſounds in their language, and repreſent them very imperfectly by ang, ong and ing. But, though the final g certainly does not enter into that ſound; there is ſomething ſo exactly reſembling a final n, at the cloſe of it, that it cannot be generally diſtinguiſhed from it. Indeed their typifying it by an n ſeems to be a proof of this; though, if it be uſeleſs it ought to be ſunk as much as poſſible, and the ſound thereby corrected; as the twang of the conſonant makes it very harſh and diſagreeable to the ear.

To this errour, of blending the ſurd and vocal modes of articulation together, may be added the too frequent uſe of compound articulations both vocal and ſurd. The firſt, diſtinguiſhed in writing by the term diphthong, conſiſts in the joining of two vocal ſounds of different qualities in one note or ſyllable; but from this, little inconvenience ariſes; if the two are pronounced in the key and time of one. Triphthongs in ſpeech we have few or none, nor will modern volubility admit of it.

The ſecond, conſiſts of the joining two or three ſurd forms together, which cannot be clearly diſtinguiſhed, without the emiſſion of an indiſtinct ſound between each, as in the words ſtrength, breadth, whelm, lopt, liſp, &c.

The author of the Elements of Criticiſm obſerves, that every articulate ſound, into which a conſonant enters, muſt neceſſarily be double; becauſe conſonants, being pronounced with a leſs cavity of the mouth than vowels, they are of a different tone. But this is not altogether the caſe; the tone or key of the voice is not formed by the aperture of the mouth, though though it may be a little varied by it; but by the aperture in the wind-pipe. The audible conſonants are formed, indeed, by the aperture and appulſe of the organs of ſpeech, but they have no muſical tone. If they had they would be vowels; as is plain from the contraction and prolongation of ſuch modes as take either form.

It is conjectured by ſome linguiſts, and that not without foundation, that moſt, if not all, theſe compound articulations are formed by the ſuppreſſion of ſome vowel; which formerly intervened between each; as in common converſation and frequently in writing we ſay lov'd for loved, ſtopt for ſtopped, and ſo forth. But from whatever ſource they are derived, they tend evidently to load the remaining vowels with indiſtinct ſurds; and, as we have too many of them in our language already, I am not for encreaſing their number, by taking too great a latitude even in the allowed contraction of the preterite of our verbs. On the other hand, I could wiſh that all ſuch words were ſuffered to grow into diſuſe; of which the articulation is thus complicated and diſſonant.

We cannot indeed new model our language, but we need not aggravate its imperfections. Nothing has contributed more to the adulteration of living languages, than the too extenſive acceptation of Horace's rule in favour of cuſtom.

Cuſtom is undoubtedly the rule of preſent practice; but there would be no end in following the variations, daily introduced by caprice. Alterations may ſometimes be uſeful, may be neceſſary; but they ſhould be made in a manner conformable to the genius and conſtruction of the language. Nothing can tend to greater confuſion in ſpeech, for inſtance, than the practice of adopting words of foreign growth, without the leaſt variation either in ſound or orthography. And yet even this is better than what we ſometimes do, in adopting the ſound without the orthography, and the orthography without the ſound. The French have in this particular carried their attention to the peculiar ſtructure of their language to a ridiculous ſcrupuloſity; having not only galliciſed terms of art and appellatives; but even given Chriſtian names to Pagans and frenchified the whole race of patriarchs, heroes and philoſophers of antiquity. Modus eſt in rebus. Extremes in this, as in all other caſes, are hurtful. We ought by no means to ſhut the door againſt the improvement of our language; but it were well that ſome criterion were eſtabliſhed to diſtinguiſh between improvement and innovation.

The natives of a country are not ſo apt, indeed, to adopt the ſounds of other languages, as to adapt their own to a foreign orthography. The adoption of different ſounds is not eaſy, and is an affectation or an errour peculiar to thoſe who have travelled, and have made the different modes of articulation familiar to their organs. A good ſpeaker however will never mix the diſtinguiſhing tones of different languages together, any more than he would mix the words of one language with another. If he ſpeak Engliſh, it will be in the tones of an Engliſhman; and if French, in thoſe of a Frenchman. If he cannot do this, he cannot ſpeak both languages with propriety; how great a maſter ſoever he may be of their conſtruction or phraſeology.

Now it is impoſſible to attain this propriety with regard to particular languages, without fully comprehending the circumſtances on which the preciſion and propriety of articulation in general depends.

Next to the ſuppreſſion or quick diſcharge of the indiſtinct ſound of the conſonants and clear intonation of the vowels, a proper articulation depends on the preſervation of that unity of ſound which is eſſential to a ſyllable, and is neceſſary to diſtinguiſh one ſyllable from another.

Simple vowels are diſtinguiſhed from each other by the clear and diſtinct quality of their ſound, but ſyllables by their unity; thus a ſyllable may not only include the clear ſound of a vowel, but alſo the indiſtinct ſounds of one, two or more conſonants: which, being forcibly and quickly uttered, do not deſtroy the unity of ſound, characteriſtic of a ſyllable.

Again, a ſyllable may ſometimes include two vowels of different qualities; but if both be uttered by a ſingle impulſe of the voice and within the time of one; that is, in a ſingle key and time, the diſtinction of quality is ſo little, that the unity of ſound is ſufficiently preſerved in the articulation; eſpecially if the tranſition between the two qualities be fluent and eaſy, and their ſucceſſion quick.

Moſt of our long ſyllables in Engliſh have a diphthongal ſound, but it is perceptible in none, when properly pronounced, except in ſuch as ſeem too long by having a ſecond in quality joined to two in quantity. Thus nought is in quality the long ſound of not, and is uttered twice as long; but when to this quality of ſound is added the ſhort i as in annoy, boy, &c. the diphthong, that is the two qualities of the ſound, are perceptible. And yet, as in a good articulation we pronounce both ſounds in the ſame key and time, they form but one ſyllable. A diphthong in ſpeech is not two diſtinct articulate ſounds of different qualities, but one ſound partaking of two different qualities in one diſtinct articulation.

Some writers have conſidered ſyllables as ſingle ſounds, diſtinct not only in unity but in quality. But unity and ſimplicity are different modes of diſtinction; the one characteriſtic of vowels only, the other of ſyllables. A vowel is diſtinguiſhed by its ſimplicity; it cannot have two diſtinct qualities: a ſyllable may be a compound of qualities, though ſingle in its identity of compoſition and utterance.

The profound inveſtigations, which have been made into the ſimple qualities of articulate ſounds, and the nice diſtinctions which ſome have affected to eſtabliſh, between the radical and derivative, are of little conſequence to diſtinct articulation. Neither is it of any moment whether the ſound of a ſyllable be ſimple or compound in its quality, provided it be ſingle and diſtinct in its pronunciation. Not but that it would contribute greatly to the preciſion of ſpeech, if none of theſe compound modes of articulation were practiſed: and indeed we daily find, by the pronunciation of good ſpeakers, that both vowels and conſonants tend to coaleſce, where their diſtinction would deſtroy the unity of the ſyllable.

This unity is nevertheleſs difficult, and ſometimes impoſſible to be preſerved in ſome combinations, in which the qualities of the combined ſounds are particularly different. Thus in the Engliſh diphthong oy as in joy, boy, &c. the ſlender ſound of the ſhort i is ſo very different rent from the broad aw which precedes it, that it is difficult to pronounce them ſo quick as to incorporate them both in one ſound, without that difference being perceived. This however is attempted, and thoſe words are accounted monoſyllables.

The caſe is worſe in the combination of the long ſounds of the vowels with the liquids, and particularly with an r, as in mare, mere, mire, and ſtill worſe in ware, wire, &c. which are ſtill pronounced quick as monoſyllables, though they have evidently two or three ſounds of different qualities; one of which being diſtinct and long, it is impoſſible to pronounce ſuch words, ſtrictly ſpeaking, as monoſyllables. The word hire, for inſtance, is pronounced exactly like higher, which is allowed to be a word of two ſyllables; for a verſifier cannot make two of it, though he would be condemned for making two of the ſame ſounds in the former word.

It is pretended that, among the Greeks and Romans, their written alphabet exactly accorded to the ſeveral diſtinct ſounds and modes of articulation, in their language: ſo that each ſound had its diſtinct mark, by which it was uniformly and invariably repreſented. Hence it is ſuppoſed that their articulation muſt neceſſarily be diſtinct, preciſe and clear. But this numerical preciſion, between the literal and oral elements of their languages, tho' of uſe to readers, was of little uſe to preciſe articulation. If they had the long ſlender ſound of our vowels, and pronounced the r in the ſame manner as we do, it would be impoſſible for them to join them, ſounding the vowel firſt, without putting an indiſtinct ſound like an u between that and the cloſe of the conſonant. This is ſo evident that, when the ſhort ſound of the vowels precedes the r the two ſlendereſt, viz. i and e are generally converted into a diſtinct u. Thus Sir, her, bur have but one and exactly the ſame quality of ſound.

Mr. Sheridan gives this as an inſtance of the different methods of pronouncing the i and e, but as it is to be met with in no other caſe than when they precede the liquid r, it ſhould be imputed rather to the natural effect of the combination. We do indeed ſometimes in the middle of words preſerve the proper and peculiar ſound of both before the r, as in mirrour, merry, &c. but theſe inſtances are ſo few, that the ſemivocality of the liquids, and particularly the r, may paſs for a general rule in all languages.

SECTION IV.

Of the Combination of Syllables, in the Formation of Words.

It is by the mode of analyſis that we are led to inveſtigate the elements of ſpeech, as well as thoſe of all other compound ſyſtems. And yet it does not appear that any actual ſyſtem of language was originally formed by ſyntheſis, in a regular mode of compoſition. Men did not firſt learn the ſeveral diſtinct ſounds and modes of articulation, and then invent the art of putting them together, in the manner we now teach children. On the contrary, it appears, as well from the rude jargon of ſavage nations, as from the language of the Chineſe, and the hieroglyphical relicks of ancient Egypt, that, in the infancy of ſpeech, men ſpoke in ſentences. A ſingle ſound, like a Chineſe character or Egyptian ſymbol, ſometimes ſignified an hiſtorical fact, a religious tenet or a moral ſentiment. It was not till long after men began to ſpeak, and had converſed both by ſounds and ſigns, that the analytic art was arrived to the perfection of conſtructing an alphabet, or decompounding their languages into the ſimple elementary ſounds, of which they were compoſed.

The advantages, reſulting from ſuch decompoſition, are too obvious to be inſiſted on; the event being evidently the reduction of a confuſed and indigeſted jargon, into a regular and ſyſtematic form of ſpeech. It is not my taſk to admire the invention but to illuſtrate its uſe. I have obſerved that unity of ſound is eſſential to a ſyllable in ſpeech; which is not a combination of ſucceſſive diſtinct ſounds, as a written or printed ſyllable is of diſtinct letters; but a compound of elementary articulations, incorporated into one diſtinct and articulate ſound.

A word differs from a ſyllable in that the latter is a mere articulate ſound, independent of meaning; whereas the latter is not only audible and articulate, but is by convention and cuſtom ſignificant and intelligible.

This conſideration, of the ſignificancy annexed to ſounds in the compoſition of words, not only renders their preciſe articulation neceſſary to ſpeech; but gives riſe to the farther neceſſity of diſtinguiſhing in diſcourſe between ſignificant words and mere ſyllables.

The firſt and moſt ſimple method, of diſtinguiſhing words from mere ſyllables, is to divide words by ſhort intervals of time in ſpeaking, as they are divided by intervals of ſpace in writing; while the ſyllables are uttered, as they are written, without any ſuch break or interval. Some linguiſts, particularly thoſe of the French nation, have laid down expreſs rules for joining one word to another, in many caſes, particularly when the laſt letter of the one be a conſonant and the beginning of the next a vowel. This is done to avoid the ſuppoſed cacophony of beginning a word with a vowel. But granting it productive of greater euphony, or rather conducive to greater volubility, of ſpeech, for the ſake of which that talkative nation, as well as ſome other, even ſacrifice ſometimes the very rules of grammar; it is yet to be conſidered, that one of the great ends of language is to be underſtood, and that human ſpeech is not calculated merely to tickle the ear. If in writing a language men were to join all the words together, as they do the letters in a ſingle word, would it not perplex the eye and tend to render ſuch writing confuſed and unintelligible? In the ſame manner, and for a ſimilar reaſon, the joining of the words together, by articulation in ſpeaking, muſt have the ſame effect on the ear. This practice therefore is a vice in ſpeech, in whatſoever language it be admitted, and tends to reduce the converſation of intelligent and rational creatures into mere gabble. That Colloquy may not be reduced, however, to the tedious neceſſity of too formal a ſeparation of words by intervals of time; it is cuſtomary in moſt languages, and particularly in the Engliſh, to diſtinguiſh them from each other by emphaſis and accent. The former of theſe is not improperly called by ſome writers the oratorial accent, the latter the ſyllabic. The difference is obvious: the former might prevail in a diſcourſe conſiſting in words of one ſyllable; the other can take place only in polyſyllables.

By Emphaſis, or the oratorial accent, words are diſtinguiſhed from each other by the more or leſs forcible manner of pronouncing them, in conſequence of their dignity and importance in the ſentence: a diſtinction that is always obſerved, even in the moſt ſimple ſentence, which has nothing in it that is uſually called emphatical. Even a plain indicative aſſertion, or a definition of terms, without relation or conſequence, would not be diſtinctly intelligible, if every word of it, though monoſyllables, were uttered exactly in the ſame time and tone. At leaſt it is not the cuſtom, in any language, to utter the moſt indifferent ſentence with the ſame unvarying monotony*. But of this more hereafter. It is the ſyllabic accent only which is concerned in the formation of words, by the combination of ſyllables.

This is ſuppoſed indeed by ſome writers to be of ſuch importance, that it is called the very eſſence of words, the link which binds the ſeveral ſyllables of words together; without which, words would be only ſo many collections of unconnected ſyllables. Mr. Sheridan, in particular, affirms that Engliſh words, properly pronounced, have no more than one accent, and that we always hear as many words as we hear accents. This circumſtance he conſiders, as one of the greateſt perfections in the Engliſh language.

This perfection, however, is in a great degree imaginary, as the circumſtance itſelf is but partially true. Engliſh words indeed, of more than one ſyllable, have always one accent, and the longer polyſyllables two and even three. But the uſe of the accent ſeems rather to be that of marking the moſt ſignificant ſyllables of a word, by a greater ſtreſs of voice, in order to render it more audible and intelligible; than merely to divide it from the other words in the ſentence. I will not deny that in words of two or more accents, one is uſually made ſtronger than the other; by which they may generally be known to be comprehended in one word; but I deny that this is always proper or pertinent. It is ſaid that, if any one places two equal accents on the ſame word, it ſounds to our ear like two words. This may be, and it is very proper it ſhould be ſo in many caſes; and that even ſometimes in words of but two ſyllables; as in all ſuch compound words as the following; earthquake, quickſand, ſackcloth, lukewarm, hailſtone, &c. To pronounce ſuch words with propriety, it is neceſſary both ſyllables ſhould be accented with the ſame force, and that they ſhould ſound to the ear like two words, becauſe they each contain the meaning of two words.

That radical words of a ſingle meaning, or expreſſive of a ſimple idea, ſhould have but one accent, is juſt and reaſonable. If we could trace ſuch words, however, to their primitive root, we ſhould probably find them all monoſyllables. But, as in the preſent ſtate of etymology it is impoſſible and indeed unneceſſary, we muſt admit of many diſſyllables and triſyllables among the radicals of modern languages.

Theſe undoubtedly ſhould have but one accent; though not becauſe it is the peculiar genius of the Engliſh tongue; but becauſe they expreſs each a ſingle idea, which would

* Mr. Sheridan, who confers the ſyllabic accent on monoſyllables, ſays that all words of one ſyllable are accented, except the particles; but this is not true; nor are all monoſyllables equally accented at all times, as is the caſe with the accented ſyllables in polyſyllables. Hence it is plain that the varied oratorial, and not the conſtant ſyllabic, accent takes place in monoſyllables.

beſt be expreſſed by a ſingle ſound; and, as this cannot always be, ſome radicals being polyſyllables, their unity is diſtinguiſhed by the utterance of ſome one ſyllable more forcibly than the reſt. Hence it is plain that a language, ſuch as the French, in which the ſyllabic accent does not prevail, muſt want this kind of perfection, which contributes to preciſe intelligibility.

It is a matter of great diſpute on which ſyllable the accent in words ought to be laid. This would be eaſily determinable, could we trace every word to its monoſyllable root; as it is preſumed inconteſtible that, while ſounds are typical of our ideas, and the great end of ſpeech is to be underſtood, ſuch radical ſyllable ought to be accented in preference to all others.

In radical words of more than one ſyllable, the place of the accent is either ſettled by cuſtom, through arbitrary caprice, for etymological reaſons we cannot trace, or for reaſons of euphony, deducible from the genius and nature of the language. Thus in arbitrarily forming a new word of two ſyllables, the Engliſh would lay the accent on the firſt; while the French in the ſame caſe would dwell longer, ſeeming to an Engliſh ear to lay an accent on the ſecond. It is hence conceived, and laid down as a general rule, that in Engliſh the accent ſhould in all words be brought forward as poſſible. But this rule ſhould prevail only in radical words, and in ſuch only where no etymological reaſon gives the preference to any particular ſyllable: for in the pronunciation of compounds and derivatives it would be, as I ſhall preſently ſhew, falſe and abſurd.

A ſingle example may ſerve to illuſtrate the caſe as to polyſyllable radicals. To advert is a word evidently deduced from the Latin and compounded of ad and verto, meaning to turn to, mark or obſerve any object of attention, Here the verb being the more ſignificant part of the compound, the prepoſition being merely circumſtantial, the accent of courſe is laid on the ſyllable vert. In the formation of word advertize, the ſame rule was obſerved, and it was formerly accented on the ſecond ſyllable. But as it bore a ſenſe diſtinct and different from advert, it was found neceſſary to change the place of the accent. In this caſe the laſt ſyllable being merely formal, it was naturally to be ſuppoſed that the accent, according to the rule abovementioned, ſhould be thrown upon the firſt; which, though not ſo ſignificant as the ſecond, is more ſo than the laſt. Other reaſons prevailed. The French, Italian and Spaniſh uſe the ſame word, ending long. Adopting it therefore as a radical of three ſyllables the accent was laid in Engliſh on the laſt*.

That this is the real caſe is plain from the fate of a ſimilar word. From the verb divert was, in like manner, formed diverti/e with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable. But, as the former word gradually deviated in popular uſe from its radical ſenſe, and was as much made

* A remarkable inſtance, of our placing the accent on the longeſt ſyllable of words adopted from other languages, and making the whole a radical word; is the term recitative, borrowed from the recitativo of the Spaniſh and Italian. We have all the roots of this word in our own language; to recite, recital, recitation, recitative: in all which the accent is placed by our lexicographers either on the ſecond or third ſyllable. And yet when we mean to expreſs the particular mode of ſinging ſo called, the accent is placed on the very laſt ſyllable, as the moſt ſignificant and expreſſive of the whole.

uſe of, to ſignify what divertiſe was formed for, the latter grew into diſuſe, and it was never found neceſſary to change the place of the accent at all.

It may be conceived that languages are not improved in ſuch regular and rational methods; ſeeming to be governed more by accident and caprice. But neceſſity and convenience inſenſibly operate in practice to effect what theory deduces from a ſtudied plan. Syſtems are founded on facts much oftener than facts on ſyſtems. There are many cuſtoms, thought to be the effect of caprice, that are the work of nature; which always operates with a truly philoſophical and unerring regularity. It is indeed an eaſy way, that blockheads have got, of ſolving all difficulties reſpecting language, by referring to the criterion of cuſtom; but though cuſtom be admitted the arbiter of ſpeech, caprice is by no means the arbiter of cuſtom.

I have obſerved that in compound words of two ſyllables in which the ſignificant ſyllables are of equal importance, they ſhould be founded as like two words as poſſible; the accent laid upon one being very little more than that laid on the other. The ſame rule will hold good reſpecting compounds of three or more ſyllables. In thoſe of three particularly the two accents are ſo equally and diſtinctly heard, that our different ſpelling books and vocabularies give the ſame words, ſome as accented on the firſt and others on the laſt ſyllable. To inſtance only a few. Appertain, architect, aqueduct, beautify, bountiful, circumvent, condeſcend, diſallow, enterprize, immature, interview, manifold, manuſcript, maſquerade, &c. In a proper pronunciation we always lay two accents on ſuch words; nor is, or ought to be, one ſo much ſtronger than the other, as by that difference alone to diſtinguiſh them both in converſation as belonging to one and the ſame word.

The intelligibility of ſpeech requires that every ſignificant or radical ſyllable ſhould be diſtinctly heard, and that in compound words, comprehending two or more ſuch ſyllables, every one of them be accented, and that with a greater or leſs force in proportion to their ſignificance. And in caſes, where a number of polyſyllables ſhould hence be apt to render diſcourſe indiſtinct, for want of a due ſeparation of the words, the delivery of ſuch a diſcourſe ſhould be proportionally ſlower, to admit of the neceſſary intervals of time between them. Without this, the moſt eloquent and elaborate ſpeaker in the world would only gabble. He would not ſpeak.

As to mere derivatives, and the accent which ariſes from convenience in pronouncing a number of ſyllables in ſucceſſion. This might be ſuppreſſed in a great meaſure, becauſe it is frequently laid on a mere formal aud inſignificant part of the word. And yet they, who would confine words to one accent, make this, and not that on the radical and ſignificant ſyllable, the principal accent. Thus in all words ending in ation, the principal accent is placed on the formal a, as in viſitàtion, veneràtion, multiplicàtion, &c. But is it not inconſiſtent with the very end and deſign of ſpeech to pretend that the ſignificant ſyllable of the radical word on which the particular meaning depends ſhould give place, in point of audibility, to the mere formal a which is common to a thouſand words of different meanings?

This

This practice is quite conſiſtent alſo with the rule of bringing the accent in Engliſh as forward as poſſible: a rule which leads in like manner to many abſurdities in practice, when too generally adopted. I remember that our Engliſh Roſcius, having an eye to this rule, once queſtioned me for laying the accent on the ſecond ſyllable of the word refractory: the propriety of which I maintained by obſerving that it was the moſt ſignificant ſyllable in the word, and that which was accented in the radical word refract. To this he replied, by the unanſwerable jus & norma loquendi, inſiſting that the accent ſhould be placed on the firſt ſyllable: in which caſe however, the diſtinguiſhing ſound of the radical word would be entirely loſt. If this method were proper in pronouncing the adjective refractory, it would be proper alſo in pronouncing the adverb refractorily and the ſubſtantive refractorineſs. But how could this be done, without giving a new accent, or transferring the old one to the third ſyllable, as in the caſe of ſimilar words of five ſyllables?

What tongue could articulately and intelligibly pronounce a word of five ſyllables, with a ſingle accent only on the firſt! It is obſervable that the advocates for bringing the accent forward, hourly contradict their theory in practice. The word advertiſement they will hav according to their rule, to be accented as formerly on the ſecond ſyllable. But why do not they begin firſt, by bringing it forward from the laſt ſyllable in the radical word advertiſe. If they ſay, they do lay an accent both on the firſt and laſt ſyllables, though greater on the laſt; I anſwer that, then their practice is wholly contrary to all rules reſpecting both ſenſe and ſound; for that they lay a great ſtreſs on the formal and moſt inſignificant ſyllable, a leſs on a more ſignificant, and on the moſt ſignificant none at all.

I am ſenſible that the Euphony of ſpeech frequently interferes with the rules, founded ſolely on its ſignificancy; and that they ſhould mutually give way, for the convenience of each other. But if either be to ſuffer eſſentially, it ſhould certainly be the ſound rather than the ſenſe. There are ſome good rules, nevertheleſs, that ſerve well enough for their reciprocal accommodation.

It is above remarked that in the longer polyſyllables, ſuch as viſitation, veneration, multiplication and the like, there are two accents; the principal of which lies on the firſt ſyllable, and the other on the third. Now it happens that in many other words of ſimilar ſtructure, the accented or ſignificant ſyllable in the radical word is the ſecond; ſo that in pronouncing the derivative after the manner the ſenſe requires, both accents would come together; which would prove very diſagreeable to the ear. In this caſe therefore, but in this only, the accent is neceſſarily brought forward. Thus when from the verb to lament, to profane, to exclaim and the like, the accent of which lies on the laſt ſyllable, we form the ſubſtantives lamentation, profanation, exclamation, we throw the firſt accent on the firſt ſyllable; as it naturally ſtands in viſitation, veneration, multiplication, formed from viſit, venerate, multiply, whoſe accents lie on the firſt ſyllable.

Not but that in ſuch derivatives of three ſyllables, as are formed from radicals of one, we are obliged, if we mean to be intelligible, to pronounce two accents together; or, which is the ſame thing, to lay a ſtreſs equal to an accent on the ſuppoſed unaccented ſyllable: thus thus in the words formation, ſalvation, damnation, &c. we find ourſelves under the neceſſity of pronouncing the firſt ſyllable at leaſt as forcibly as the ſecond; we ſhould otherwiſe be abſolutely unintelligible.

And yet, according to the common notion of the uſe of accented ſyllables in words, the ſecond only need be heard to make the reſt underſtood*. The truth is that the accented ſyllable receives its conſequence, in point of ſound, from the inſignificance of the other ſyllables to which it is joined in the ſame word. In words of two ſyllables it is moſt diſtinguiſhed, the difference between the accented and unaccented ſyllables being then greateſt; as in the longeſt polyſyllables that difference is the leaſt. In the words manly, booty, dwindle, &c. this difference is palpable, and the words would be underſtood if the unaccented ſyllables were hardly heard: but it were impoſſible to pronounce any of the following words tolerably diſtinct, without laying almoſt as much ſtreſs on the ſuppoſed unaccented ſyllables, as as on thoſe which are confeſſedly accented. Aſſeveration, ariſtocratical, commemoration, excommunication, diſcontinuation, eccleſiaſtical, recapitulation, tranſubſtantiation, &c. It is very palpable, in pronouncing theſe words, that the accent loſes its force in proportion to the number of ſignificant ſyllables contained in each word; a circumſtance that makes ſtrongly againſt the uſe of the ſeſquipedália verba in rhetorical diſcourſe. It were unneceſſary to inſiſt farther on the abſurdity, of pretending to link a great number of ſyllables intelligibly together by one leading accent.

Before I diſmiſs this ſubject, however, I cannot help obſerving that the ingenious author, of the Elements of Criticiſm, is of the ſame opinion in this reſpect with Mr. Sheridan; laying it down as a general obſervation, that a word of whatever number of ſyllables, is not accented upon more than one of them. "Nor is this practice, ſays he, merely arbitrary: the object repreſented by the word, being ſet in its beſt light by a ſingle accent: reiterated accents on different ſyllables in ſucceſſion make not the emphaſis ſtronger, but have an air, as if the ſound only of accented ſyllables were regarded, and not the ſenſe of the word".

Now it is very certain, that if the longer Polyſyllables above-mentioned were pronounced with only one accent, the ſenſe of the word would be totally diſregarded; as the accent is thereby laid on the moſt inſignificant ſyllable in the whole word: thus in excommunication, diſcontinuation, reconciliation, &c. the accent, if ſingle, would be laid on the ca and a; in the words immutability, infallibility, &c. on the il, and in circumlocution, circumvolution, &c. on the cu and lu. Is it poſſible that by ſuch a method of accentuation, the object of words can be ſet in the beſt light, or the ſenſe of them be moſt regarded?

If it be ridiculous, as the ſame writer obſerves, "to put an emphaſis on a word that of itſelf has no meaning, and, like cement, ſerves only to unite words ſignificant", the ſame rule is equally applicable to the ſyllables forming words; ſome of which are ſignificant, and others merely formal.

* Among many inſtances that might be given of this abſurdity of confining words to a ſingle accent; let theſe two examples from a late celebrated Engliſh dictionary ſuffice. Formidolóſe, formidolóſity. If an Engliſh auditor could underſtand what theſe words meant by hearing only the accented ſyllable, or, even with the aſſiſtance of all the reſt pronounced without accent, I am much miſtaken.

It is only in ſimple, radical words, therefore, that we ſhould confine ourſelves to a ſingle accent: compound words, whatever be their number of ſyllables always requiring at leaſt as many accents as there are roots contained in them.

As to mere derivatives, which I diſtinguiſh from *compounds, their number of ſyllables will, as obſerved, frequently require a ſecond and a third accent: theſe adventitious accents however, ſhould be all ſubordinate and pronounced with leſs force than the radical accents; by which the principal ſignification of the word is known and determined.

The advocates for this unity of accent in Engliſh words, ſtrive indeed to conceal the abſurdity of it, by pretending to give a greater ſtreſs to the diſtinguiſhing accent in polyſyllables. But I may ſafely appeal to every Engliſhman, that hath ears and underſtanding; to determine whether this is either actually done, or ought to be done. Mr. Sheridan, nevertheleſs, lays down this unity as a fundamental rule, upon which the very eſſence of our words depends, and which, he ſays, is ſo univerſal, that there is not a ſingle exception to it in our whole language, when the words are properly pronounced.

But how would Mr. Sheridan pronounce the words following? Acquieſce, appertain, cavalcade, circumvent, condeſcend, diſallow, immature, magazine, maſquerade, reconcile. Theſe, and many other words, are, as above obſerved, ſet down in our vocabularies, as being accented on the laſt ſyllable. Again, others are ſet down as accented on the firſt ſyllable; ſuch are architect, aqueduct, beautify, circumſpect, enterprize, interview, intercourſe, manifold, manuſcript, retrograde, &c.

It is very evident, however, on a bare repetition of theſe words, that they might change liſts, or, with the ſame propriety, be put into one: they are all, indeed, particularly thoſe in the laſt liſt, equally accented both on the firſt and the laſt, and very juſtly ſo; for if the end of emphaſis and accent be to convey the moſt ſignificant parts of ſentences and words forcibly and diſtinctly to the ear, no reaſon can be given why the firſt and laſt ſyllables in theſe words ſhould not be equally accented.

Nothing, indeed, can be more deſtructive of the principal end and inſtitution of accent and emphaſis, than this practice of huddling the ſignificant ſyllables of a word together, in order to lay a ſingle accent on one, perhaps the moſt inſignificant of the whole. Yet this vicious practice, Mr. Sheridan's rules naturally tend to promote. Thus, in forming derivatives of four ſyllables from words of three, the ſtreſs of the accent is ſuppoſed to be encreaſed upon the third, and diminiſhed on the firſt. By this method, however, the meaning of the word is totally obſcured: thus from cavalcade and maſquerade, ſhould we form cavalcàding, maſqueràding, and pronounce them without laying an equal accent on the firſt ſyllable, the ſignificant part of the word would be hurried over, to ſwell the ſound of a mere expletive or formal ſyllable, common to all words ſo modified, as is the caſe alſo, above obſerved, in all words ending in ation†.

* Thus the words earthquake, quickſand and the like, are compounds and require two equal or very nearly equal accents: but earthly, quickly, and all ſuch words as have only the formal terminations peculiar to our language, I call mere derivatives; which till they contain at leaſt four ſyllables may be included under one accent.

† In admitting that the longer polyſyllables have two accents, Sheridan affirms that the one is ſo much weaker than the other, as to ſhew that the ſyllables are all included in one word. As a proof of this, he quotes the word expoſtulatory. But what will he ſay to the words acʹcident, mónument, artificʹial, ábrogàte, and a thouſand others.

Is it not contrary to the very purpoſes of ſpeech, and even to common ſenſe, to pretend, that the ſounds of the firſt ſyllables of theſe words, on which their meaning ſolely depends, ſhould be weaker than the formal ma, ta, za, which are common to a thouſand words of different meanings?

There is a farther circumſtance, which ſets this pretended unity of accent in a futile point of view. This is, that in Engliſh we have two modes of accentuation entirely different, ſo that when they are both uſed, as is very common, in the ſame word, it is impoſſible without affectation to lay a diſtinguiſhing ſtreſs on the one more than the other; becauſe being already diſtinct in their own nature, they have nothing in common by which to make the comparative diſtinction. A polyſyllable, that has an acute accent and a grave one, as viſitàtion, fermentàtion, and the like, will, in ſpite of all our attempts, ſound to the ear like two words, if we are to judge of the number of words we hear by the number of accents. But of this more particularly, when we come to conſider the nature of accent, as it is uſed in modern languages, and particularly in Engliſh.

Next to the errour I have thus endeavoured to explode, in the uſe and intent of the accent reſpecting the formation of words; is another of equal importance to pronunciation, that of dividing them into ſyllables.

Nothing can be more foreign to the profeſſed purpoſe of the art of ſpelling, than the rules which Engliſh Grammarians have in general laid down for it. The very examples they bring to illuſtrate thoſe rules, indeed frequently exhibit their fallacy. The reaſon is obvious; they are founded upon no ſolid baſis; but are arbitrarily adopted from other languages, as if every language had not peculiarities of its own. The learned, more intent on the literal than the oral conſtruction of ſpeech, have neglected this important branch of elocution; contenting themſelves with the maxims of pedants, who have abſurdly adapted the uncertain rules, for the pronunciation of the dead languages, to that of the living.

The beſt and only ſure rule of dividing words into ſyllables, is, according to Dr. Lowth, to divide them as they are naturally divided in a right pronuciation. With due deference, however, to ſo good a ſcholar, this is to ſuppoſe the end attained, before we inveſtigate the means of attaining it. A perſon who is already maſter of a right pronunciation need not be taught how to ſpell. It is by firſt learning to ſpell, that perſons ignorant of a language or depraved in point of dialect, are taught rightly to pronounce. I ſee otherwiſe no uſe the ſpeaker has to divide words into ſyllables at all. Children, indeed, are taught to read by ſyllables, but they learn to talk by words. They prattle whole ſentences articulately and intelligibly long before they learn to ſpell; and, if bred up under poliſhed ſpeakers, would never know the uſe, or betray the want, of ſpelling, unleſs they ſhould learn to read others. Will it be ſaid, that the ſtrongeſt accent lies on the firſt ſyllable? Let us then add a ſyllable to each, and ſay ac'cidéntal, mon'umen'tal, ar'tific'ial, ab'rogàtion: the accent now becomes ſtronger on the third ſyllable; but can it be conſiſtent with a proper method of pronunciation to ſink the firſt ſo much, as to confirm the rule in queſtion? The abſurdity of this notion will appear farther, if we reflect on the principal uſe of accent and emphaſis, which is to enforce the moſt ſignificant ſyllables and words. Now to make one accent, and that the moſt inſignificant, in polyſyllables, like Aaron's ſerpent, ſwallow up the reſt, is to defeat the firſt and principal end of energy in pronunciation. See RICE's Art of Reading.

and write. Hence it is that our natives ſpeak properly enough, notwithſtanding the abſurd methods which are taken in teaching them to ſpell; which would otherwiſe render it impoſſible for them to acquire a true pronunciation by ſuch means. Foreigners are very ſenſible of this, when they are told that the firſt and general rule in Engliſh ſpelling is that, "a ſyllable in the beginning or middle of a word ends in a vowel, unleſs it be followed by x, or by two or more conſonants", and hear the words adage, agitate, agony, alum, amazon, amicable, analyze, animal, azure, baniſh, body, briton, bury, buſy, cavil, cavern, celery, celebrate, and hundreds of others; they find the rule to be falſe: the firſt ſyllable in all ſuch words, when properly pronounced, ending with a conſonant. Nor is the ſuppoſed exception leſs exceptionable than the rule. Their ear preſently informs informs them that, though x be literally a ſingle character, it has always either the power of ks or gz; and that though the k and g belong to the firſt ſyllable, the s and z always belong to the ſecond. In pronouncing the words Alexander or example, we do not ſay Alekſ-ander, or egz-ample, but Alek-ſander, eg-zample. In this caſe, I ſay, a foreigner, ſeeing both our rules and exceptions equally fallacious; he naturally deſpairs of acquiring the true pronunciation of our tongue; or at leaſt he is perſuaded he muſt learn it by rote and not by rule. But this matter will be farther explained, when we come to illuſtrate it by examples.

SECTION V.

Of the Compoſition of Sentences, and their Delivery in common and oratorial Diſcourſe.

The diſtinct articulation and ſignificant pronunciation of ſingle words being attained, the next object in view is their proper combination in ſentences, and their expreſſive delivery in common converſation and rhetorical diſcourſe.

The combination of words in ſentences, follows different rules in different languages, agreeably to their variation in point of grammar and idiom. Euphony of ſound hath in this, as in all other caſes reſpecting the uſe and elegance of ſpeech, a very conſiderable influence.

Much hath been written, to little purpoſe, about the natural order or ſucceſſion of words in diſcourſe: but, as languages were not originally formed on philoſophical principles, their grammar and idiom are of courſe widely different. It is indeed generally imagined that, in ordinary diſcourſe our words follow each other in ſome natural order: but on due examination perhaps we ought to ſay habitual, inſtead of natural. For certain it is that this order in different languages is widely different, which would hardly be the caſe if our words ſucceeded each other in any particular order, determined by that in which our ideas ariſe in the mind.

Abbé Batteaux makes a diſtinction, it is true, between the order in which our ideas are primarily ſuggeſted, and that in which they flow from us in words, and of courſe arrange themſelves in diſcourſe. It is this latter which he denominates the natural order of words; and ſays it ſhould be the ſame in the narration and deſcription of things, as that which ſub-ſiſts in the things narrated and deſcribed. Without entering however into the philoſopical inveſtigation of a ſubject, attended with ſo many difficulties as that of determining what this order really is; I ſhall preceed to a more practical method of removing the obſtruction. It will be readily admitted that, to make the hearer the more readily maſter of what is ſaying to him, we ought to give the moſt conſpicuous place to the words expreſſive of the moſt intereſting object. In conformity to this rule, the abovementioned writer remarks that the Greek and Latin languages follow the order of nature in their conſtruction; and that this order is violated in moſt other languages.

But if this be true, what ſhall be ſaid to father Cerceau and ſome others; who maintain that, in the conſtruction of the Latin tongue, provided the words which ſhould enter into the compoſition of a ſentence, be there collected, it is very often of little importance in what order they are placed, and what rank they poſſeſs: as that which is placed in the beginning of the period, might as well be placed at the end: ſo that by throwing the words of a ſentence confuſedly into a hat, and drawing them out one after another, like lottery tickets, their arrangement would be found always ſufficiently regular?

This opinion of the conſtruction of the Latin, is adopted by Mr. Sheridan, who ſpeaks of it as an advantage or perfection; but I cannot help thinking, that were this irregularity of poſition carried to ſuch extent as above repreſented, it would be rather a diſadvantage or imperfection, tending to render that language leſs preciſe and intelligible. This caſual and adventitious poſition of words, however, is, like the fortuitous concourſe of Atoms, in a great degree chimerical. It is true that ſome languages, and the Latin in particular, admit of a greater diverſity of tranſpoſition than others: but notwithſtanding the latitude allowed them in this reſpect, in rhetorical and poetical compoſition, it is certain that the Latin, as well as all other languages, hath an idiomatical ſucceſſion, or order of words, in the ſtile of common diſcoure, and ſimple narration, which is in ſome inſtances peculiar to itſelf. With regard to modern languages, it is moſt certain they have not only an idiomatical arrangement of words peculiar to each, but their modes of tranſpoſition are alſo equally peculiar; while ſome of them, particularly the French, will hardly admit of any tranſpoſition of words at all. Now one of the firſt and moſt indiſpenſible qualifications in the ſpeaker of any language, is a perfect knowledge in the idiomatical order of its words in common diſcourſe aud ſimple narration. Indeed, the grammatical conſtruction of modern tongues, depends ſo much on this order of ſucceſſion in the words, that they will by no means admit of arbitrary tranſpoſition; without being rendered equivocal and ſometimes unintelligible. Lord Kaims adduces a number of examples, in his Elements of criticiſm, to ſhew that our beſt writers have not duly attended to the proper arrangement of words: by which means the ſenſe hath been rendered doubtful. The affectation of variety in ſtile, and pomp of diction, hath indeed led many writers into equivocal modes of expreſſion; while others again have fallen into it through mere careleſſneſs and inattention. The firſt beauty of ſtile, however, is propriety, without which all ornament is puerile and ſuperfluous. Now the tranſpoſition of words being very common in our language, and ſometimes even in our ordinary diſcourſe, by way of rendering it more ſignificant, it behoves the ſpeaker to be well appriſed of the idiomatical order of words, words, and of all the allowed modes of tranſpoſition. Nothing indeed is more neceſſary to qualify a reader to repeat what is laid before him at ſight, and of courſe to facilitate his entering into an author's meaning, than ſuch a general acquaintance with the idiomatical modes of expreſſion, and the uſual arrangement of words. It is from a knowledge of this arrangement, that the auditor ſo readily accompanies, and ſometimes even anticipates the meaning of the ſpeaker; as it is from the ſame knowledge that the ſpeaker is enabled to deliver his ſentiments with eaſe and fluency. Without this, he might have what plenty or choice of words he pleaſed, he would never be able to ſpeak his own ſentiments, or repeat thoſe of others, with grace or propriety. Hence it is that foreigners, even after having acquired a copia verborum and a tolerable pronunciation of particular words, yet ſpeak in a very different manner from the natives. The French and Engliſh differ not very widely in this reſpect, as the arrangement of their words, in common diſcourſe, is not very different. But the German and Low-Dutch uſe a number of parentheſes, and generally cloſe their ſentences, in imitation of the Latin, with a verb, that governs the whole; ſo that their periods are ſupported with a more equal tenour of voice, and generally cloſe with a full and bold ſound: Whereas the French and Engliſh, too commonly bringing out their leaſt ſignificant words laſt, drop their voice towards the latter end of their ſentences, and cloſe them feebly. Hence perſons converſant in many languages, will take upon them ſometimes to determine what language another ſpeaks, although they ſhould not be near enough to hear a ſingle ſyllable articulately; being ſufficiently informed by the general cadence of the voice in diſcourſe. Indeed the difficulty ſeems not to be very great; as there muſt be a ſenſible difference between the tenour of voice pronouncing the German periods of a mile, and thoſe frequent breaks inſeparable from the ſhreds and patches of a French tête a tête. As to the acquiſition of this knowledge of the idiomatical order of expreſſion, natives of a good education are ſeldom at a loſs in ſpeaking, and by due attention to the ſtile of the moſt ſimple, preciſe and elegant writers, may attain all that is neceſſary to enable them to profit by it in reading. With regard to foreigners, indeed, it is neceſſary that they ſhould be inſtructed in the particular influence, which the idiomatical order, and the tranſpoſition of words, have on the grammatical conſtruction of the ſentence they compoſe.

As my deſign here, however, is rather to inveſtigate the ſound than the ſenſe of ſpeech, I ſhall defer the farther conſideration of this ſubject to another opportunity. Preſuming then the order of verbal ſucceſſion, with the idiomatical and grammatical conſtruction known, I proceed to conſider the uſe of the oratorial accent, or, as it is generally called, emphaſis, in the proper delivery of diſcourſe.

I have already obſerved that the modern ſyllabic accent, particularly that of the Engliſh tongue, is of two kinds, a flat and a ſharp, or a ſlow and a quick, mode of pronouncing particular ſyllables in one word. The oratorial accent conſiſts in laying a forcible ſtreſs on particular words in a ſentence, or parts of a ſentence; and is not diſtinguiſhable merely by the modes quick and ſlow; but may be practiſed with great variation; being in fact nothing more than a ſpirited aſpiration, or, as Mr. Foſter obſerves, the afflatio in latitudine of Scaliger.

I cannot indeed give the reader a better idea of the proper diſtinction, between the oratorial and ſyllabic accents, than in the words of the firſt-mentioned learned writer.

" As there are accents naturally on particular ſyllables of ſingle words, which muſt be rightly placed to make pronunciation ſimply proper; ſo there are accentual variations of the voice on the particular parts of whole ſentences, and on particular ſentences of whole paragraphs, the right inflexion of which conſtitutes good, graceful, and harmonious pronunciation. The connexion of this, which may be called the oratorial accent, with the ſyllabic, and the ſubordination of them to each other, however difficult it may appear; is yet eaſy in practice. This it is, that forms the difference which we obſerve in the manner of ſpeech between any two perſons, that uſe the ſame language. Let a good ſpeaker and a bad one pronounce the ſame ſentence, which they both equally underſtand, they will in the ſingle words agree in placing the acute and long time on the ſame ſyllables, and yet in the utterance of the whole differ very widely. Whence ariſes this difference? Not from the ſyllabic accent, which reſpects the modulation of one ſyllable of a word in regard to another. But from the oratorial, which reſpects the modulation of whole words and parts of ſentences in regard to the reſt. And this oratorial accent may have aſpiration or not, according as the general manner, or particular intention of the ſpeaker may happen to be. This latter kind of accent is what Quintilian means in that part of his book, where he ſpeaks of reading: " ſupereſt lectio; in qua puer ut ſciat, ubi ſuſpendere ſpiritum debeat, quo loco verſum diſtinguere, ubi claudatur ſenſus, unde incipiat, quando attollenda vel ſummittenda ſit vox; quid quoque flexu, quid lentius, celerius, concitatius, lenius dicendum, demonſtrari niſi in opere ipſo non poteſt." This accent of ſentences has not yet had marks aſſigned it, and perhaps could not eaſily be aſcertained by grammatical characters: which makes Quintilian ſay that, " demonſtrari niſi in opere ipſo non poteſt."

It is very certain that propriety of emphaſis in oratorial declamation, can only be learned by imitation and practice: but it is as certain that thoſe, who ſpeak articulately and converſe freely in any language, need no other object of imitation than their own practice. For it is truly remarked by Sheridan, that every man who clearly comprehends what he ſays in private converſation, never fails to lay the emphaſis on the right word. The neceſſary rules therefore, that relate to the obſervance of a proper emphaſis in diſcourſe, muſt be calculated only for ſet forms of declamation and not for familiar colloquy.

In this view the ſpeaker is a mere reciter or reader; and in ſuch ſituation it is impoſſible for him to lay his emphaſis right, unleſs he firſt fully comprehend the meaning, and enter into the ſpirit of what he is about to read or recite. Nor will he do this merely becauſe the compoſition is originally his own; there being few writers, as the laſt-mentioned author likewiſe juſtly obſerves, who do not recite their own compoſitions, exactly in the ſame way they would do thoſe of any other writer; excepting perhaps their doing it with more emotion, and thereby rendering any abſurdity in their manner the more ſtriking.

In ordinary converſation indeed, as well as in pathetic declamation, where the ſubject takes poſſeſſion of the heart and excites the paſſions of the ſpeaker, he will of neceſſity lay his emphaſis right, as well as give his diſcourſe the diverſity of tone which intereſting and affecting affecting expreſſion require; but if his delivery is to be artificial, it is by art only that he will attain the ſemblance of nature.

To effect this, I ſay again, the ſpeaker muſt ever perfectly enter into the ſenſe and ſpirit of what he is about to ſay. To this end, he is not immediately to direct his attention, as is commonly done, to the moſt ſtriking and emphatical parts of the diſcourſe; but, on the contrary, to conſider firſt the ſimple meaning of each ſentence, according to its grammatical conſtruction, and as it ſtands detached from every other part of the oration. This being done, he may proceed to examine its relation, and the relation of all its parts to the context; bearing conſtantly in mind, that the emphaſis ſhould ever be conſiſtent with grammatical conſtruction, and ſhould ſerve to confirm and enforce the meaning of each particular ſentence, while it connects and gives greater ſignificancy and pathos to the whole.

There is a general meaning in every ſentence grammatically written or ſpoken, and which muſt always be conſidered antecedent to the particular meaning given it by emphaſis; nor can theſe poſſibly be contrary to each other, how particular ſoever may be the turn which the latter may give to the former. A material ſubſtance may be modified into a variety of forms; but thoſe forms muſt be conſiſtent with the nature of the ſubſtance; nor can it with any propriety be ſaid, that the mere form of a thing gives being and conſiſtence to it. The articulate pronunciation of every word in a ſentence is the baſis of all ſpeech; and no ſtreſs or emphaſis ſhould be laid on any particular word in any ſentence, without a due regard to the general meaning of the whole, and of the juſt pronunciation of every word in that ſentence.

With reſpect to the almoſt endleſs variation to be introduced into the manner of laying the oratorial accent on the emphatical parts of diſcourſe, I do not ſee any poſſibility of communicating ſufficient rules for the management of the voice, unleſs it may be done vivâ voce by a good ſpeaker. Even in this caſe, however, there is ſome danger of the learner's being a mere mimic of the particular ſounds of his maſter's voice; without acquiring a knowledge of the general mode of expreſſion. For, though we may determine what words are to be emphaſized, and the comparative ſtreſs to be laid on them, yet different people have very different modes of laying the ſame ſtreſs, or giving the ſame degree of ſignificance to words. Nay, the ſame perſons frequently expreſs the ſame words, equally ſignificantly, in very different tones. This matter therefore muſt be left to the taſte and particular powers of the ſpeaker.

SECTION VI.

Of Proſody and Verſification.

The confuſion, which is introduced into the proſody of modern languages, by affecting to reduce it to the ſtandard of the ancient, is not more perplexing than it is abſurd and ridiculous. It is an errour nevertheleſs into which many of the ingenious among the learned have occaſionally fallen. The miſcarriage of Sir Philip Sidney's attempt to eſtabliſh Engliſh hexameters, ameters, in imitation of the Latin and Greek, one ſhould have thought, might have convinced our proſodiſts of the futility of endeavouring to meaſure living ſounds by dead letters. What the learned Dr. Bently alſo ſaid of the metra dactylica, quod patria lingua non accipit, might with propriety have been extended to almoſt every other ſpecies of ancient meaſures. We have notwithſtanding ſome curious attempts of this kind of much later date, in which our Engliſh ſyllables are moſt whimſically applied to a ſcale, to which they are hardly in any ſhape adapted. When I hear an Engliſh proſodiſt thus talk of his Iambics, his Trochees, his Anapæſts, his Amphybrachys, and his Palimbacchics, I cannot help reflecting on the ſarcaſm of the Poet;

> That all a Rhetorician's rules,
> But teach him how to name his tools.

for certainly, in this caſe, nothing is more aukward than the bungling he makes, when he goes to work with them.

The manifeſt difference, between the proſody of the ancient and modern languages, is indeed ſo great, that it hath induced ſome writers to deny the very exiſtence of quantity in the latter. "The language of the Romans," ſays a certain French writer, "was like the Greek, wholly compoſed of words, of which the ſyllables were either long or ſhort: it thereby became ſuſceptible of the ſame numbers, and by conſequence, of the ſame kinds of poetry with the Greeks. It is quite otherwiſe with us. The modern languages, quite different from the Greek and Latin, are wholly compoſed of words, the ſyllables of which, to judge of them properly, are neither long nor ſhort: that is to ſay, their pronunciation is not reſtrained to any fixed time. It is therefore impoſſible that our proſe, ſtill more ſo that our verſe, ſhould have the ſame meaſure, numbers, cadence, and harmony with theirs. To ſpeak properly, we have not in our language either epic poem, ode, elegy, or comedy. For our verſes differ from each other only in the number of ſyllables."

It muſt be confeſſed, that the French language is the leaſt ſuſceptible of poetry of any of the modern European tongues; and yet were not the above aſſertions, reſpecting its being abſolutely deſtitute of quantity, advanced by a Frenchman, I ſhould not altogether aſſent to them. But be it as it may with regard to the French tongue; the caſe is very different with the Engliſh; whoſeſyllables have perhaps all the variety of long and ſhort, that we have any reaſon to think prevailed among the Greeks and Romans. We have not indeed the ſame chaunt of accent, which rendered the Greek tongue in particular ſo very melodious as is repreſented; the modern uſe of accent differing entirely in this reſpect from the ancient. If we credit the very extraordinary ſtories that are told us, of the effect of the Grecian oratory, we muſt infer, that in their declamation they not only poſſeſſed, and made uſe of, all the powers of words but of ſounds alſo; and that their ſpeech was in fact a kind of ſong. The vaſt improvements, however, that have been ſince made in muſical ſcience, have left declamation at a vaſt diſtance behind, in the career of harmony. At the the ſame time the propriety and preciſion of ſpeech have induced modern orators to make a total ſeparation between ſpeech and ſong, by rejecting all kind of chaunt; or ſpecies of melody, in diſcourſe. Hence it is that the preſent meaning of the word accent bears no relation to its original original uſe among the Greeks and Romans. It is a little ſurprizing, nevertheleſs, that ſome very ingenious writers who are ſenſible of this, ſhould ſtill be miſled, by their attention to the practice of the ancients, reſpecting the true nature and uſe of modern accent. But I ſhall elucidate this matter farther, when I come to treat of Engliſh proſody and verſification in particular; when I ſhall bring examples to prove the inaccuracy and inconſiſtency of their obſervations on this ſubject.

CHAP. II.

ON THE ORTHOEPY OF THE ENGLISH TONGUE.

SECTION I.

On the Elements of Engliſh Pronunciation.

It is the common errour of linguiſts to attempt to teach the pronunciation of languages by means of the written alphabet; but the written elements of language are ſo inapplicable to the elements of ſpeech, that the difficulty of making any proficiency in a foreign tongue, by ſuch means, is inconceivable by thoſe who have not made the experiment.

As there are but a certain number of notes in muſick, ſo there are but a certain number of articulate ſounds in every language.—In different languages their number differs, and there are but few ſounds in any two languages that are exactly the ſame; although by the great intercourſe between the European nations, the ſounds of different languages daily aſſimilate.—In Engliſh we have eleven diſtinct ſpecies of articulate ſounds, which even by contraction, prolongation and compoſition, are increaſed only to the number of ſixteen; every ſyllable, or articulate ſound, in our language, being one of this number. Theſe, therefore, I call the oral elements of the Engliſh Language. The number of our literal Vowels falling conſiderably ſhort of theſe ſounds, it would be impoſſible to expreſs or denote them in writing, by thoſe characters; even if ſuch characters conſtantly ſerved to denote diſtinct and different ſounds: but this is ſo far from being the caſe, that the ſame ſound is frequently denoted by ſeveral different letters, and the ſame letter ſerves to expreſs very different ſounds. To give even the Engliſh reader a true notion of theſe elements, by means of the dead letter, we muſt therefore make uſe of ſuch words or ſyllables as would convey them diſtinctly when properly pronounced.

The

The different ſounds of all Engliſh ſyllables are thus contained in the following Liſt.

Syllables of the ſame quality, differing only in quantity or time.

SHORT.		LONG.
As in Hat, hand, mann'd.	——	As in Hard, Command.
Men, met, led.	——	Mane, mate, laid.
Fit, kiſs, win.	——	Feet, geeſe, ween.
Not, what, pond.	——	Nought, wall, pawn'd.
Pull, wool, hood.	——	Pool, noon, hoop.

Syllables different in quality and quantity.

LONG and BROAD.
As Joy, toy, boy,
Noun, town, bough.

LONG and SLENDER.
As New, ſhoe, yew, few.
High, die, try, fie.

LONG and OPEN.
As No, toe, foe, go.

SHORT and CLOSE.
As Cur, Sir, her, bird.

This laſt ſound is frequently ſo contracted as to become in a manner quite ſurd, as in the the articulation of ſyllables ending in ble, ple, cle, the colloquial pronunciation of the particles, and the ſame method of ſinking ſhort ſyllables in the middle of words; as hath been before obſerved.

Nothing can be more defective than the definitions, and diſtinctions of our Grammarians reſpecting the elements of living language.

They divide them generally into vowels and conſonants; the former of which is defined to be "a ſimple articulate ſound, uttered by a ſingle impulſe of the Voice."

The latter are divided into ſemi-vowels, liquids, and mutes. A vowel is ſaid to be a ſound formed "by the opening only of the mouth in a particular manner." Whereas a Conſonant forms no articulate ſound of itſelf, but aſſiſts in forming ſuch a ſound "by a particular motion or contact of the parts of the mouth."

Theſe diviſions and definitions, however, are ſo little preſerved, that the very ſame Grammarians tell us alſo, that a diphthong or compound vowel, is the union of two or more vowels pronounced by a ſingle impulſe of the voice." But how can there be two ſimple articulate ſounds uttered by a ſingle impulſe of the voice? And that by opening of the mouth only in a particular manner? If the mouth be opened only in one particular manner, it will emit only one vowel, not two; and if two are emitted there muſt be ſome change effected in the manner of opening the mouth; ſome motion or difference of contact in the parts. The truth is, that few of our Vowels are pronounced merely by the emiſſion of the breath through the open mouth; while on the other hand, there are few of our Conſonants ſo ſurd as to be altogether void of ſound.

There is a peculiar contact, and often ſtrong appulſe of the parts of the mouth, in pronouncing ſome of the Vowels. The conſonants alſo change their nature frequently by poſition: thus l, m n, r, f, and ſ are called half vowels, and are ſaid to have a kind of obſcure ſound, while b, c, d, g, k, p, q, t, are ſaid to have no ſound at all. But let us place m at the beginning of a ſyllable, and it is nearly as mute as b. You cannot open your lips to pronounce either without making it ſerve to articulate ſome following vowel. Again, the ſoft ſound of c and g at the beginning of words is equally vocal with that of ſ. Again, b, d, p, t, at the end of words are conſiderably more vocal than even l, m, n, r, at the beginning of them.

If we attend to the operations of nature in the proceſs of articulation, we ſhall find that our nominal conſonants and vowels have not that eſſential difference which is uſually imagined. The moſt vocal of all vowels and the muteſt of all conſonants may poſſibly agree with the above definitions; but the forms of articulation proceed gradually from the moſt ſurd of conſonants to the moſt vocal of vowels paſſing through all the intermediate degrees of the aſpirate, the hiſs, the mutter, the ſnarl, &c. Hence it is, that the form which ſome grammarians call a conſonant, others call a vowel, as for inſtance; the generality of Engliſh grammarians have called y and w, particularly at the beginning of words, conſonants; as in you, your, what, war; and the like.

The celebrated Dr. Lowth, however, maintains that y is always a vowel: "The ſame ſound, ſays he, which we expreſs by the initial y, our Saxon anceſtors, in many places, expreſſed by the vowel e; as eower, your; and by the vowel i, as iw, yew; iong, young. In the word yew, the initial y has preciſely the ſame ſound with i in the words view, lieu, adieu: the i is acknowledged to be a vowel in theſe latter; how then can the y, which has the very ſame ſound, poſſibly be a conſonant in the former? Its initial ſound is generally like that of i in ſhire, or ee nearly: it is formed by the opening only of the mouth, without any motion or contact of the parts: in a word, it has every property of a Vowel, and not one of a conſonant."

In anſwer to this, it may juſtly be denied, that the initial y in the example cited, is formed by the opening only of the mouth without any motion or contact of the parts. On the contrary, the tip of the tongue ſtrikes and preſſes forcibly againſt the inſide of the under fore-teeth in pronouncing yew, or you; which it does not in pronouncing view, lieu, ewe. It is ſaid y is here only ee, but this is not true; yes, for inſtance, is not merely ee-es.

Again, he ſays w is either a vowel or a diphthong; its proper ſound being the ſame as the Italian u, the French ou, or the Engliſh oo. But how can it be a diphthong? Neither the Italian u, the French ou, or the Engliſh oo are diphthongs, but diſtinct ſingle ſounds. Had he ſaid indeed that the ſyllables, what and war were diphthongs, he would have had more reaſon on his ſide; and yet the very quick and forcible pronunciation of the w in theſe caſes, gives it the property of a conſonant; even as in words where the i takes the conſonant form of the y, as in onion, minion, for we do not ſay on-i-on, min-i-on: but on-yon, min-yon.

Thus we ſee that conſonants in their moſt vocal ſtate, and vowels, in their leaſt vocal ſtate, are ſo nearly allied as interchangeably to take each others form.

The articulation of ſimple vowels is indeed very imperfect and indefinite; a ſound coming from the glottis without receiving any other modification than what it takes from the different opening of the mouth, having very little more articulation than the ſounds coming through the ventages of a flute, baſſoon or hautboy. Hence the variation of theſe ſounds in all languages is very limited; their ſpecific diſtinctions in Engliſh not amounting to more than eleven, as I have already exemplified. It is by the different forms, therefore, into which theſe ſounds are modelled by their combination with the more numerous conſonants, expreſſive of the motion and appulſe of the organs during the utterance of thoſe ſounds, that the vaſt diverſity of words are conſtituted, and the infinite variety of our ideas expreſſed.

Inſtead of following the uſual method, therefore, of enumerating the literal elements of language, and endeavouring to ſhew how they are to be pronounced in reading, I ſhall take the contrary mode; and by enumerating the ſeveral oral elements of the Engliſh tongue, endeavour to point out how they are formed by the organs of ſpeech, as well as expreſſed in writing. With this view I ſhall begin with the moſt ſurd of the mute conſonants and proceed gradually, through the different degrees of ſound, till I arrive at the moſt clear and ſonorous of the vowels.

THE ALPHABET OF SPEECH,

No. 14.	y.	equivocal, as in	young, you, duty.
15.	w.		won, will, now.
16.	u, i, e, ea, o.	vocal, ſhort, as in	tŭb, cŭb, fĭr, hĕr, cŭr, ĕarth, wŏn.
17.	u, ou, oo.	ſhort	bŭll, cŏuld, gŏod.
	ou, oo, o.	long	ſòup, nòon, whò.
18.	ow, ou, u.	long and broad	tòwn, nòun, cùcumber.
19.	o, a.	ſhort	nŏt, whăt,
	a, au, aw.	long and broad	àll, caùl, awl.
20.	oy, oi.	long and double	joy, boy, oil.
21.	i, e.	ſhort	fĭt, yĕs.
	ee, ei, ea.	long	feèt, deceìt, meàt.
22.	o, oe, ou.	long and open	nò, tòe, thòugh.
23.	u, eu, ue, ew.	long and ſlender	dùty, feùd, trùe, nèw.
24.	a.	ſhort	hănd, bărr'd.
	a, ua.	long	hàrd, gùard.
25.	e, ea, ai.	ſhort	mĕt, ſprĕad, ſaĭd.
	a, ai, ay.	long and ſlender	màte, màid, gày.
26.	y, i, ui, ie.	long and ſhrill	whỳ, nìgh, guìde, fìe.

From the above table the reader will ſee, that almoſt all our modes of articulation, whether ſurd or vocal, have two kinds of utterance; the conſonants hard or ſoft, flat or ſharp, and the vowels long or ſhort, quick or ſlow.

On examining theſe ſeveral modes apart, we ſhall ſee how far the rules, generally laid down for the utterance of letters, accord with the ſounds and modes of articulation in the Engliſh tongue.

SECTION II.

Of the Nature and Uſe of Engliſh Conſonants.

In teaching of languages, or ſpeech in general, I obſerved that, as the ſurd, or indiſtinct, ſound of the conſonants tends to obſcure the clear intonation of the vowels, the office of the former ſhould be diſcharged as ſoon as poſſible. It will hence follow that ſyllables, compoſed of the muteſt or hardeſt conſonants and the moſt ſonorous vowels, will ever be the moſt clearly and diſtinctly articulated; as is experimentally demonſtrable and will ſufficiently appear from an inveſtigation of the mechaniſm attending the utterance of the ſeveral elements abovementioned.

Of No. I. B and P: as in bab; PAP. Theſe two letters ſerve to indicate but one mode of articulation, with the difference only of a ſharp and a flat, or a hard and a ſoft, kind of utterance. They are, or ſhould be both perfectly mute as well before as after a vowel, and they ſo nearly reſemble each other, that they are frequently confounded in different dialects both ancient and modern. Plutarch obſerves that ſome of the Greeks uſed to ſay βιχρον for πικρον, βαλεῖν for πατεῖν; and among the Romans it was common for p to take place in the preterite of verbs, whoſe preſent tenſe had b, as in ſcribo ſcripſi, nubo nupſi, &c. Quintilian in particular obſerves that, though his judgment required him to write b in the word obtinuit, his ear was perpetually ſaluted with a p, as if it were optinuit. The Welſh univerſally put p for b; and the Germans, in pronouncing Latin, ſay ponum for bonum, ponitas for bonitas.

Theſe letters are both ſounded by firſt preſſing the lips hard together, and then emitting the ſound by ſuddenly burſting them aſunder. Dr. Anſelm Baily calls P a ſoft B; But I ſhould rather call p the hard b, as it is certainly the ſharper or harder mode of articulation; the lips being preſſed harder together, and more ſuddenly ſeparated in p than in b. Indeed the French Grammarians, in which language theſe letters have exactly the ſame power as in Engliſh, admit of this diſtinction; affirming, to uſe their own words, "que le P en conſultant l'oreille, n'eſt proprement qu'un B prononcè plus fortement."

No. II. D and T: as in Dad; TAT. In this mode of articulation the lips barely open, and the tongue preſſes ſtrongly againſt the roof of the mouth, juſt within the upper teeth. It is the ſame in moſt, if not all other European tongues; the D bearing the ſame relation to T, as B does to P. It is obſervable that both theſe modes of articulation bear a near and equal relation to M and N: that is B to M and D to N. Thus perſons who have got a cold, or any other impediment in the noſe, pronounce B and D for M and N. As for the proverb, "many men of many minds," they would ſay, "Bady bed of bady bides."

No. III. G.—C, K, Q: as in gag; COCK, KICK, QUACK. The mouth, in this articulation, opens a little wider; the tongue is drawn back; creating an obſtruction to the ſound paſſing through the mouth; it lies however quite motionleſs during the paſſage of the ſound:

ſo that all theſe modes are mute or ſilent. C. K. and Q, indicate only a ſharper, or more ſudden, obſtruction to the ſound than that of G. Indeed Q and C are uſeleſs letters in the Engliſh alphabet; they being ever capable of being ſupplied by K or S.——The G is not equivalent in many other languages to what it is in Engliſh. Foreigners may nevertheleſs fully comprehend its force by conceiving it a guttural flattening, or ſoftening of the K.

No. IV. H: as in HAND. With this letter we begin to breathe, or emit the firſt of audible conſonants. Some writers, and among others the ingenious and learned Dr. Baily, affect to conſider H as a mere aſpiration, receiving no articulation from any organ of ſpeech. It cannot, therefore, ſay they, be conſidered as a letter, but as a mark of aſpiration only. That H is nevertheleſs expreſſive of a mode of articulation as much as S or Z, is in diſputable; theſe being only ſibilant modes of aſpiration, modified by the teeth, as H is by the muſcles of the Larynx and the gentle contraction of the Trachea.

To prove that H is a real conſonant, viz. that it gives form to a ſucceeding vowel, we have only to pronounce a few words beginning with vowels, and then prefix the H, and ſee if there be no difference. If H be no conſonant or mode of articulation, ell and Hell, or all and Hall would in ſpeech be the ſame. But is this true? Far from it.

The H indeed is ſometimes totally mute, but ſo are frequently the other conſonants; and this is likewiſe the caſe with this letter both in French and Engliſh; it being pronounced in both languages in the ſame manner when audible, and in both frequently, and to all appearance arbitrarily, mute: ſo that the words, in which it is audible, and in which ſilent, can be known in both languages only by practice.

No. V. DH,—TH; as in Then; THIN. This mode, which is ſuppoſed to reſemble the Theta of the Greeks, was indicated, by our Saxon anceſtors, by a ſingle character thus ð. It is formed by firſt preſſing the tip of the tongue between the teeth, and making an aſpiration at the ſame time. The difference, in the two methods of uttering it; depends on the, more or leſs, forcible aſpiration, and the ſuddenneſs of withdrawing the tongue from between the teeth. The practice is only to be attained by attentively liſtening to a good ſpeaker. The French, Germans, Dutch, and moſt other European nations have not this mode of articulation, but it is eaſily acquired by their attention to a native of England.*

No. VI. V,—F; as in Veal; FEEL. This articulation is formed by preſſing the lower lip ſoftly under the upper teeth, and breathing ſoft or hard, as the V or F is intended to be pronounced. Dr. Baily calls the former the hard ſound; but it is the contrary. F is the hard or more quick and forcible aſpirate, and V the ſofter and ſlower. The V and F bear ſo near a relation to each other, that they are frequently interchanged in Engliſh. Thus we ſay life, lives, wife, wives, leaf, leaves. The French alſo, in borrowing words from other languages generally turn the V into F: thus neuf of novus, clef of clavis, catif of cativo, &c.

* Dr. Baily tells us that gh has ſometimes this ſound, particularly in the word ſigh; but this is a provincial vulgariſm and inadmiſſible in poliſhed diſcourſe.

No. VII. J, or G, and CH: as in James, gentle; CHAIR, CHURCH, CHICHESTER. This articulation is formed by depreſſing the tip of the tongue and hiſſing ſtrongly through the teeth, when ſhut. It is ſurpriſing that ſo good a judge of theſe matters, as Dr. Baily, ſhould call the J and G a ſtronger mode than that indicated by ch. Is it ſo hard and ſharp in the words June, ginger, as in chub, chop, chin? Surely not! He calls it an aſpirated c, and likens it to the ce, ci, ge, gi, of the Italians; but the Engliſh J or ſoft G are much ſofter, and are but a little harder, or require but a very little more forcible expulſion of the breath, than the French Je; which is but a ſtrong ſibillation of the Engliſh aſpirated y. The gentle tranſition from the one to the other, is palpable in the different manner of pronouncing the appellation John, Jean, and Jan by the Engliſh, French and Dutch: the latter pronouncing it as the Engliſh would pronounce Yan, and the French as we ſhould pronounce Zhean: neither of them ſo forcible as we pronounce John or Judge, and ſtill leſs ſo than we pronounce church; or as the Italians would pronounce Ceſare, Citta; which they do forcibly, as if written tcheſare, tchitta. Indeed the J and ſoft G in Engliſh are pronouced very nearly, if not exactly in the ſame manner as the ſoft G of the Italians; not indeed according to the pronunciation of the Florentines, but that of the people of Rome: the former pronouncing the words giardino, giorno, as Engliſhmen would pronounce zhïardino, zhïorno; and the latter as we ſhould pronounce dgiardino, dgiorno.

No. VIII. Z, S—S, C: as in zeal, roſe; SUN, CEASE. Z has obtained in Engliſh the name of s hard; but it is in this caſe, as I have obſerved with reſpect to ſome other letters: the mode of articulation indicated by z is a ſofter, that is a flatter, ſlower, and more obtuſe mode of utterance, if I may ſo call it, than the common method of uttering the s, which is moſt palpably ſharper and quicker. Thus, in THIS, thoſe, theſe; we find the two latter words, in which the s has the force of a z, require a leſs ſudden and forcible expulſion of the breath than the former.

This mode of articulation is merely ſibillant, and conſiſts ſolely in forcing the breath through the teeth while ſhut: the tongue lying flat within the mouth, during the expulſion.

No. IX. SH, SI, TI, CI, CE—ZH, SI, SU: as in ſhame, paſſion, nation, ſocial, ocean; HOSIER, MEASURE, LEISURE. The firſt diſtinction of this mode is the ſame as the French ch before a vowel, or as the German ſch and Italian ſc before e and i. It is familiar to the Engliſh by the frequent uſe of the auxiliaries ſhall and ſhould, and the noiſe they make to frighten away birds or chickens from the grain. The ſecond diſtinction of this mode, which I have indicated by zh, notwithſtanding thoſe letters ſeldom or never occur in writing, differs from the firſt nearly as z differs from s, or dh from th; that is, it has a flatter and ſlower manner of utterance. I think the French uſe it exactly in their perſonal pronoun Je.

No. X. L: as in Lot, Lamb. This mode conſiſts in placing the tip of the tongue within the upper teeth, and afterwards preſſing gently againſt the palate, letting it ſuddenly fall againſt the inner ſide of the under teeth, at the ſame time breathing ſtrongly through the mouth. At the end of a ſyllable the tongue cleaves to the roof of the mouth, after the emiſſion of the vowel, in the ſame manner.

No. XI. M: as in Man, Mind. The M is formed by keeping the lips cloſe together, and endeavouring to force a ſound through the noſtrils. At the cloſe of a ſyllable it is formed by cloſing the lips and preſſing them cloſely together, breathing at the ſame time through the noſtrils, with a humming ſound; which in a good pronunciation ſhould be ſtopped as ſoon as ever the articulation is compleated.

No. XII. N: as in Nun, Noun. The N is formed nearly in the ſame manner as the L, by placing the tongue againſt the roof of the mouth, though ſomewhat flatter than in the L; at the ſame time forcing the breath through the noſtrils and along the ſides of the tongue. The N bears the ſame relation to D, as M does to B; as is plain from any adventitious ſtoppage, or natural impediment to the paſſage of the ſound through the noſe.

No. XIII. R: as in run, round. This mode of articulation conſiſts in turning up the tip of the tongue to the palate, bending it back as it were toward the throat, emitting at the ſame time a ſtrong breath through the mouth; which cauſes a trepidation in the tongue ſo ſuſpended; and of courſe a jarring, tremulous ſound. Such is at leaſt the preſent method of uttering this letter in the metropolis, as indeed it ſeems to have been of very long date; the quibble of Abel Drugger in Ben Johnſon's Alchemiſt, reſpecting the laſt ſyllabe of his name, ſerving to ſhew that our anceſtors conſidered it in the ſenſe repreſented by Perſius, who calls it litera canina; as bearing a reſemblance to the ſnarling of a dog. And yet, it ſhould ſeem that the Romans did ſometimes ſoften the harſhneſs of this articulation, by converting it into an s, or perhaps they rather converted the ſibillation of the s in ſuch caſes into the rougher aſpiration of r: for I cannot altogether agree with the grammarians, who pretend its frequent interpoſition between vowels in words derived from the Greek, as in muris from μυὸς, nurus from νυὸς, and the like, to be a proof of its ſoftneſs: although it was doubtleſs ſofter than it is in Engliſh, as we find it frequently omitted in writing before an s, and as often changed into L.* In the northern parts of England, particularly in and about Newcaſtle, we find the r deprived of its tremulating ſound, and very aukwardly pronounced ſomewhat like a w or oau.

Round the rude rocks the ragged Rachel run, is a line frequently put into the mouths of the Northumbrians, to expoſe their incapacity of pronouncing the r, as it is ſounded by the inhabitants of the ſouthern countries: and indeed their recital of it has a ſingular and whimſical effect. We are told by travellers, that there are many foreign nations, as the Chineſe and the Ilinois, who cannot pronounce the r but in their attempts give it always the form of an L.

It may be remarked of the liquids in general, that, notwithſtanding grammarians call them immutables, they are more readily changed, and liable to be uſed for each other than any of the other conſonants. This is very evident, as before obſerved, in ſuch perſons as have any impediment in the organs of ſpeech, or have caught cold, by which the breath is prevented from paſſing freely through the noſe.

* If the Roman r however was ſo ſoft, what becomes of the pretended beauty of the Arma virumque cano of Virgil's Ænead; which has been ſo often cited for its ſonorous propriety at the commencement of an heroic poem?

No. XIV. Y; as in Young, yes. This articulation conſiſts in laying the tongue flat in the mouth, and preſſing the tip of it hard againſt the under teeth, and breathing forcibly through the mouth, when it is intended as a conſonant; and by preſſing in like manner very gently, and breathing more ſoftly when it is a vowel: for I have already obſerved, that this mode of articulation is not always a vowel, as Dr. Lowth affirms. In being a vowel alſo, I do not here mean that open vocal ſound it has in in my, thy, try, &c. but the ſlender ſound it has in Phyz, and at the end of polyſyllables, as in charity, divinity, &c. The former open ſound will be conſidered, when I come to ſpeak of the vowels.

The Y conſonant is not always indicated in writing by that letter, but frequently by an i, and ſometimes by an e, as in queſtion, chriſtian, bounteous, courteous, &c. In theſe caſes indeed it is generally ſaid that the ti and te have the force of ch: thus, queſtion, chriſtian are divided and pronounced thus, queſ-chon, chriſ-chan; but the effect would be exactly the ſame, if the words were more etymologically divided thus, queſt-ion, chriſt-ian, and inſtead of pronouncing a ch, we were to give the i the force of y, as in on-ion, min-ion, ſaying queſt-yon, chriſt-yan. With regard to the ſound, it is indeed the very ſame, whether the y conſonant follows the t, or the ti be converted into ch. It is the ſame thing alſo with the te as the ti. Thus in court-eous, bount-eous, by giving the force of y to the e, thus court-yous, bount-yous, we have the ſame ſounds as if we divided the words thus cour-teous, boun-teous, and gave the te the force of ch. In words, however, where an i, or an e, follows the t, I would prefer the former diviſion, conſidering the e or i as y conſonant; and that not merely for etymological reaſons, but becauſe a very general cuſtom prevails, even among the politeſt ſpeakers, of giving the t alone the force of ch in many words, ſuch as nature, creature, &c. which are pronounced nachure, creachure, and that too euphoniæ gratia.

For my own part, nevertheleſs, I cannot diſcover the euphony; and though the contrary mode be reprobated, as vulgar, by certain mighty fine ſpeakers, I think it more conformable to the general ſcheme of Engliſh pronunciation; for though, in order to make the word but two ſyllables, the ti and te may require to be converted tnto ch, or the i and e into y, when the preceding ſyllable is marked with the acute accent, as in qúeſtion, chríſtian, mínion, coúrteous, and the like; there ſeems to be little reaſon, when the grave accent precedes the t, as in nàture, creàture, &c. for converting the t into ch, and not much more for joining the t to the firſt ſyllable, and introducing the y before the ſecond, as nàt-yure, creàt-yure.

This will appear in a ſtronger light, if we conſider that the i or e is converted into y conſonant, in minion, courteous, &c. merely to avoid making thoſe words three ſyllables; the difference in the pronunciation being but little, whether we articulate quickly, min-i-on, court-e-ous, or ſlowly, min-yon, cour-chous, or rather court-yous: a circumſtance that ſtill farther confirms the obſervation of the vowels and conſonants taking each other's form, as they are more quickly or ſlowly pronounced. But why the t, when followed by neither i nor e, is to take the form of ch, I cannot conceive: it is my opinion, a ſpecies of affectation that ſhould be diſcountenanced; unleſs we are to impute it to the tendency in the metropolitan pronunciation of prefacing the ſound of u with a y conſonant; or, which is the ſame thing, converting the t or s preceding into ch or zh, as in nature, meaſure, &c. Theſe are niceties, however, that foreigners and provincials need not give themſelves much trouble about, though profeſſors of Engliſh and public pleaders ought to get them aſcertained.

No. XV. W: as in Will, Won. The W, Dr. Lowth affirms to be, as well as the Y, always a vowel; its proper ſound being the ſame as the Italian u, the French ou, or the Engliſh oo. But this is a very imperfect method of defining ſounds; neither of the letters, in the three languages ſpecified, retaining always exactly the ſame ſound in different words.

The W in Engliſh is of that equivocal ſpecies of articulation, which is either a vowel or a conſonant, as it is ſlowly or quickly pronounced. The learned philologiſt juſt-mentioned, calls it a diphthong; but, as I have ſaid, neither the Italian u nor the French ou, are properly diphthongs, but ſingle ſounds; as w is, or would be in Engliſh, if we uſed it as a vowel: but that in a good pronunciation we do not, will appear, on recurring to practice, and comparing it with the definitions theſe grammarians have laid down in theory. If w be a vowel or a diphthong, the words woe, won, what, when, muſt be words of two ſyllables. But who makes them ſuch either in theory or practice? People in general would certainly ſet him down for a pedant, who ſhould uſe them otherwiſe than monoſyllables in verſe, or ſhould drawl them out in ſpeech, ſaying oo-oe, oo-on, oo-at or oo-en. As a farther proof that w is a conſonant, may be brought the inſtances in which it is uſed to give a form to a vowel without being written, or entering literally into the word at all; as in the numeral one and the letter y, always pronounced wone and wy. In this particular alſo the w accords with the y; which is made uſe of in the ſame manner before the letter u; which is pronounced, when the five vowels are repeated by their names, as if it were preceded by a y, exactly like the word you. We do not ſay a, e, i, o, u; but a, e, i, o, yu. It is certainly a vicious mode of pronouncing the vowels; as we might with equal propriety ſay, ya, ye, yi, yo, yu: but the example ſerves the preſent purpoſe, of proving that both y, and w, are uſed to give a form to the vowel, determining the ſingle and ſpecific quality of the ſyllable; which is the eſſential characteriſtic of a conſonant.

I will not contend that either is not a vowel at the end of a ſyllable containing a preceeding vowel, as in the words joy, boy, now, brow, which words, if you will, may be called diphthongs; but, if the beauty and propriety of articulation conſiſt in the clear and preciſe utterance of ſounds, which are diſtinctly audible and intelligible in proportion as their different qualities and modes of articulation are ſucceſſively diſtinguiſhed, even a diphthong is a vice in ſpeech and ſhould be corrected. Now this can only be done by dividing ſounds of different qualities, into ſeparate ſyllables, or by a quick and forcible utterance of one of them, converting it into a conſonant, giving form only to the other.

SECTION III.

Of the Nature and Uſe of Engliſh Vowels.

Before we enter on the diſcrimination of the particular modes of uttering the vowels in Engliſh, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that the clear intonation of the vowels in general, appears to have been an improvement in language much later than the practice of articulation by conſonants. Hence it is that, in the more ancient and imperfect languages, there are to be found words, whoſe meaning is determined ſolely by the conſonants, and may be pronounced indifferently with any of the vowels.

The number indeed of preciſe and diſtinct vowels is in any language but few: and though they are multiplied in modern tongues ſo far, that our neighbours the French pretend to have no leſs than five and twenty vowels or ſounds of diſtinct qualities in their language, I am perſuaded their grammarians miſtake, and that if they did not, ſuch a multiplicity muſt frequently occaſion a diſtinction without a difference, and at beſt ſerve only to perplex an articulation, that is not the cleareſt and moſt ſonorous of poliſhed tongues.

It is certain that, from the confined nature of the organs, the ſimple natural ſounds, to be diſtinct, muſt be few: and, though artifice and affectation may invent a greater variety, they muſt be deficient in preciſion as they increaſe in number. In Hebrew the Grammarians have generally adopted four vowels, a, e, i, o or u, while ſome of them have denied the e to be any thing more than an aſpirate. Agreeably to this, the Arabians allow only of three vowels, a, i, o or u. The Greek had originally alſo but four vowels, a, e, i, o, for the letters η, υ and ω, were added afterwards; and when, after much inveſtigation and altercation among the revivers of ancient literature, the ſound was to be given them, they could make the two *ε*s, the epſilon and eta, different only in length, and not in quality, of ſound: this was likewiſe the caſe with the two *ο*s, or omicron and omega: and as to the ι and υ, or upſilon and ïota, they are pronounced by moſt foreigners in the ſame manner; ſo that as to the vowels, conſidered as ſounds, the Greeks appear after all to have had no more than four, that differed in quality.

I have ſhewn that in Engliſh there are no more than eleven ſounds that differ in quality; and even in theſe it will be found that ſome of them are ſo nearly allied, as to be interchangeably made uſe of, and that by the beſt ſpeakers, without any ſenſible impropriety: thus No. 4. and 6 of the Dictionary reſemble each other ſo much, that the words, ſhoe, do, rue, rule, tune, and many others, may be pronounced after either manner without impropriety. The ſame may be ſaid of No. 4. and No. 8. and the words door, floor, gold may be either pronounced, ^{4}DOOR, ^{4}FLOOR, ^{4}GOLD, or ^{8}DOOR, ^{8}FLOOR, ^{8}GOLD, without any imputation of a foreign or even provincial accent.*

* The natives of Ireland and our northern countrymen go ſo far as to uſe indifferently No. 1. and 3, and No. 12 and 14, ſaying ^{1}BUL for ^{3}BULL, and ^{12}PLAYS, for ^{14}PLEASE; but by this they betray their provinciality.

By

By the addition of the ſeveral diſtinctions, introduced by a multiplication of the vowels, it is true, that mankind have acquired a greater diverſity in the matter of ſpeech: but theſe vocal diſtinctions are by no means ſo forcible and preciſe as the conſonants. As in the mixture of colours in painting, there are many artificial varieties to be made, ſufficiently diſtinguiſhable from each each other by connoiſſeurs and artiſts; but the ſtrongeſt and moſt preciſe diſtinctions of coloured lights and ſhades, do not come up to the full partition of black and white, or the diviſions marked out by the primary colours of light. Thus, although there be more clearneſs and preciſion in the articulation of poliſhed tongues, notwithſtanding their increaſe of vowels, than in the imperfect guttural languages; yet the nicer vocal diſtinctions, affected by fine ſpeakers, tend not only to render their language enervate but indiſtinct. In the volubility of converſation, the vowels are frequently confounded with each other, by the beſt ſpeakers. Nothing, therefore, can tend more to correct the preſent errours, eſtabliſh a criterion and make future improvements in ſpeech, than the pointing out the natural diſtinctions, and our endeavour to keep their number as ſmall, and their quality as preciſe as poſſible. To effect this, it is requiſite to attain not only a clear conception, but alſo a diſtinct articulation of the ſound of the vowel, detached entirely from the preceding or ſucceeding conſonant. This is of the utmoſt conſequence; as audibility depends juſt as much on the clear intonation of the vowels, as intelligibility on the quick and forcible diſcharge of the conſonants.

To proceed therefore with the vowels, as they follow in the order of the preceding Alphabet.

No. XVI. Of the Oral Alphabet, or No. I. of the following Dictionary.

The indiſtinct a, e, i, o, u, ou or oo, are as in earth, her, Sir, won, cur, blood, ſcourge. As a full confirmation of what is above advanced, reſpecting the ſeveral vowels aſſuming the place of each other not only in diſcourſe but in writing, we find that this ſound is denoted in different words by every one of the five vowels. Thus in the words he-ard or heard, herd, bird, word, curd, we find exactly the ſame quality of ſound indicated as in the above, by the different vowels a, e, i, o, u.

It is of this ſound to be remarked, that not only in colloquial, but alſo in oratorial and poetical ſtile, it is contracted and rendered almoſt toneleſs in ſpeech, and is indicated in writing by almoſt every poſſible combination of literal vowels. I have before mentioned this ſound when contracted, as denoted in the following dictionary by a cypher [°] placed over the ſyllable thus pronounced, or rather thus ſuppreſſed, in pronunciation. The particles a and the, when not emphatical, as alſo, words ending in ble, ple, &c. have been given as inſtances. But we have plenty of words, in which the vowels ou, ow, &c. are ſuppreſſed in like manner in the middle of words; ſuch are humorous, bellowing, and many others.

The full ſound of the vowel, as exemplified above, or in the words Sir, her, cur, &c. is always ſhort and bears a near, if not exact, reſemblance to the ſound of the French leur, cœur, &c. if it were contracted in point of time.

It is farther obſervable of this ſound, that the people of Ireland, Yorkſhire, and many other provincials miſtake its uſe; applying it to words which in London are pronounced with the u full, as in No. 17. of the preceding Alphabet, or No. 3. of the Dictionary: as bull, wool, put, puſh; all which they pronounce as the inhabitants of the Metropolis do trull, blood, rut, ruſh. Thus the ingenious Mr. Ward of Beverley, has given us in his grammar the words put, thus and rub, as having one quality of ſound; but unleſs by the word put be meant the ſubſtantive, a Dutch game of cards ſo called, or the ludicrous appellation given to provincials of country put, it is never ſo pronounced. The verb, to put, is pronounced properly * like pull, which is only a contraction of the ſound of pool; or like full, a contraction only of fool.

No. XVII. of the Alphabet, or III. of the Dictionary. The ſhort u, ou, or oo, as in bull, could, good. I have, in the preceding paragraph, remarked, that this ſound is not of the ſame quality as the former number; bull and trull, could and cud, good and blood being no rhimes in London; where they have a very different and diſtinct quality of ſound. I have ſaid, that this ſound is only a contraction of the following long ſound; by which it may be better diſtinguiſhed; though I know of no rules whatever that determine polite ſpeakers to give this ſound to ſome words, and the former ſound to others of the like orthography. It appears to be the effect of capricious and arbitrary cuſtom, like that of annexing the aſpirated h to ſome words, and not to others of like ſpelling; which is done, as well in Engliſh as in other languages, merely according to cuſtom; has its local diſtinctions, and is, I believe, to be learned only by attention to practice. The French have this ſound in the words, fol, ſol, trou, clou, &c. the Italians, I think, every where in their u; the length of which, however, their grammarians have not determined.

No. XVIII. of the Alphabet, or IV. of the Dictionary. The long ou, oo, o, as in ſoup, noon, who. This ſound is, as obſerved, of the ſame quality with the former, and differs only in quantity or length of time; nearly as the ſound of douze, epouſe, pouce, roux, doux, and the plurals, ſols, fols, do from ſol, fol, trou, &c. I conceive, however, that neither the French nor the Italians make ſo great a difference in the long and ſhort ſound of this vowel as the Engliſh do; nor indeed have I met with an Italian or French linguiſt, who has paid ſufficient attention to this circumſtance to be able to inform me; and, though I can truſt my own ear with reſpect to this difference in words of my own language, I cannot truſt it ſufficiently to determine between words of other languages.

I ſpeak of the French and Italian; becauſe the French is ſo very general a tongue, and of the Italian, becauſe the Italians are, of all nations, thoſe who poſſeſs the cleareſt enun-

* By being properly pronounced, I would be always underſtood to mean, pronounced agreeable to the general practice of men of letters and polite ſpeakers in the Metropolis; which is all the ſtandard of propriety I concern myſelf about, reſpecting the arbitrary pronunciation or quality of ſound given to monoſyllables. Setting this caution aſide, I know of no rule to determine, whether the provincial method of pronouncing ſuch words be not as proper as that of the Metropolis.

ciation of the vowels. They indeed liquidate, or vocaliſe, if I may be allowed the term, the conſonants too much. This renders their language particularly harmonious, but not equally intelligible or diſtinct. On the other hand, the ſtrong aſpiration and forcible expulſion of the conſonants, by the Northern nations, though it obtunds and obſcures the tone of the vowels, gives their ſpeech a peculiar diſtinctneſs and energy. A good ſpeaker ſhould learn to pronounce his vowels from the Italians, and to articulate his conſonants from the Germans, Engliſh, Swedes, or rather the Indians of North America. The French, by confounding both together more than any other European nation, have a leſs diſtinct articulation than moſt.* Luckily for their language, it is ſo literally improved, and is of ſo happy an etymological conſtruction, that men of letters can underſtand each other in it, let them pronounce it almoſt how they will. At the ſame time it is to be obſerved, that the unlettered natives are ſo far from underſtanding learned foreigners, that they cannot underſtand each other if bred in provinces ever ſo little diſtant. But to return from this digreſſion; the ſound at preſent in queſtion is generally expreſſed in Engliſh writing by the double oo, as in boot, fool, food, where it is long, as alſo in ſtood, wood, wool, where it is ſhort; but care ſhould be taken not to ſuffer the letters to miſlead the reader, for blood, flood, &c. though written with two *oo*s, as well as ſome other words, have not this ſound, but that of No. 16. of the Alphabet, or I. of the Dictionary; being pronounced as if written blud, flud. †

No. XVIII. of the Alphabet, or II. of the Dictionary. The long and broad ow, ou and u, as in town, noun, cucumber. This ſound greatly reſembles the barking of a full-mouthed maſtiff, and is perhaps ſo clearly and diſtinctly pronounced by no nation as by the Engliſh and Low Dutch. The nicer diſtinguiſhers in the qualities of vocal ſounds, conſider it as a compound; but as it has ſufficient unity, when properly pronounced, to be uttered with a ſingle impulſe of the voice, and to paſs for a diſtinct ſound or ſyllable, I conſider it only as ſuch.

This ſound is variouſly applied to particular words in different parts of Great Britain and Ireland. Mr. Ward gives us the words foul, ſound, grow, knowledge, as being all of the ſame ſound; whereas the two firſt only are alike in the ſound: the two laſt differing not only from the firſt, but from each other, both in quality and quantity. Thus, grow is the long ſound, marked No. VIII. in the Dictionary, ‡ as in the words no, toe, though, &c. whereas the firſt ſyllable in knowledge is the ſhort ſound, No. VII. in the Dictionary, as in not, what, and the like; which is not of the ſame quality with either No. VIII. no, toe, or the preſent No. II. how, thou, &c.

Mr. Ward ſays this ſound may be made more or leſs, cloſe and deep, by making the mouth more or leſs hollow, and directing the breath more or leſs toward the palate. To inſtance this he falls into the error countenanced by Johnſon's Dictionary; ſaying, that "a bowl,

* The French have, for inſtance, adopted the liquid pronunciation of the Italians in ſome of their conſonants; at the ſame time that they retain the horrid northern naſal or guttural pronunciation of the vowels, in an, in, on, un, aim, ain, &c. a ſound ſtill leſs clear, though perhaps not more diſtant from harmonious articulation than the ing, ong, ung of the Engliſh.

† Mr. Ward miſtakingly enumerates the words blood, ſtood, wood, as words of the ſame quality of ſound.

‡ No. XXII. in the preceding Alphabet, page 27.

meaning an orbicular body, requires a close ſound; but a bowl, meaning a veſſel, requires a more open ſound."

The people of Ireland, and perhaps thoſe of ſome counties in England, do indeed pronounce bowl, meaning a veſſel, in the ſame manner as we in London pronounce the word howl, ſcowl, &c. but polite ſpeakers in the metropolis pronounce the word bowl, whether meaning an orbicular body or a veſſel, exactly in the ſame manner; both long and open, as in the words TOLL, HOLE, ROLL, &c. *

By varying the cavity of the mouth, and directing the breath more and more inwards, Mr. Ward tells us, that this ſound approaches in ſome words to u long and ſoft, as court; or to u ſhort and ſoft, as colour, vapour; or to u cloſe, as cou'd, wou'd; or to u deep and open, as rough, tough; or to o cloſe and guttural, as cough, ſlough, meaning a place deep in mire.

Nothing can be more vague and indeterminate, than this method of deſcribing ſounds by the terms cloſe and open; eſpecially when ſuch examples are brought to illuſtrate ſuch deſcriptions which are anomolous or falſe. The word court, for inſtance, is in London indifferently pronounced COURT or COURT, in which latter caſe it differs only in time from COU'D, WOU'D, &c. and as to the o cloſe and guttural in the words cough and ſlough; theſe words are pronounced very differently, the firſt long and broad, COUGH, and the laſt with the preſent ſound, SLOUGH.

On this, as on every other occaſion of the like nature, I think it better to take a method the very reverſe of that to the Grammarians, who have hitherto treated of pronunciation; that is, inſtead of conſidering how nearly different vowels are allied, and how they are formed out of each other, to conſider what are their characteriſtic differences and diſtinctions, and how to keep them ſeparate and preciſe. We find ſufficiently, from the limited ſtate of the organs, that none of the vowels have any very eſſential difference, and how readily they are converted by impediment or affectation, into each other. The propriety of ſpeech conſiſts therefore in the preſervation of their moſt ſtriking and characteriſtic differences, and not in multiplying nice diſtinctions, or blending them confuſedly together.

No. XIX. of the foregoing Alphabet, or V. and VII. of the Dictionary. The ſhort o and a, and the long a, au, aw, &c. as in NOT, WHAT, awl, caul, awl. This ſound is common in many languages; although the diſtinction of long and ſhort, is preſerved in few or none but the Engliſh. The French have it exactly in the words ame, pas, las, &c.

No. XX. of the Alphabet, or IX. of the Dictionary. The long and double oi or oy, as in joy, boy, oil. This ſound, as hath been already obſerved, approaches the neareſt to a practical diphthong of any in our language. The qualities of the firſt and ſecond vowels differing ſo very widely in their mode of utterance, it is hardly poſſible, in ſpeech, to blend them ſo intimately as to prevent that diſtinction being perceived.

* When figures are in this manner placed over the words, they refer to the ſame numbers in the Dictionary, as exemplified in page 5, of the Introduction.

A vicious

A vicious cuſtom indeed prevails, in common converſation, of ſinking the firſt broad ſound intirely, or rather of converting both into the ſound of i or y, marked No. XXVI. in the Alphabet, and XVI. in the Dictionary: thus oil, toil, are frequently pronounced exactly like iſle, tile. This is a fault which the Poets are inexcuſable for promoting, by making ſuch words rhime to each other. And yet there are ſome words ſo written, which by long uſe, have almoſt loſt their true ſound, ſuch are boil, join, and many others; which it would now appear affectation to pronounce otherwiſe than bile, jine. We find, indeed, that this mode of pronunciation becomes every day more general; a ſtriking proof, among others, of the antipathy, if I may ſo call it, of ſpeech to the uſe of diphthongs, or the utterance of the two ſounds of different qualities, with one impulſe of the voice. The Engliſh frequently miſtake in thinking the moi, foi, &c. of the French have this ſound. It is not ſo. In the firſt part indeed there is a ſimilitude, but the laſt is much clearer and tonous in Engliſh than in French.

No. XXI. of the Alphabet, or XV. and XIV. of the Dictionary. The ſhort i and e, and long ee, ei, ea; as in FIT, YES, feet, deceit, meat. Grammarians have uſually annexed two ſounds to the i, which they have called the long and ſhort; but the ſound given to the ſhort i, for inſtance in fit, give, &c. is by no means a mere contraction of the ſound given to the long i in mine, life, &c. It is a ſound of very different quality; being a contraction of the long ſound of e or ee, in me or meet. This is plain by repeating the words fit and feet, pit and peat, mit and meat; in which the ſimilarity of ſound is very perceptible.

No. XXII. of the Alphabet, or VIII. of the Dictionary. The long and open o, oe, ou, oa; as in no, toe, though, roar. This ſound, Dr. Bailey tells us, is ſimilar to a long, but a little more round. For my part, I own I have no idea of roundneſs in ſound, nor do I think ſuch epithets can in this caſe convey any notion of the thing intended. Dr. Wallis indeed has made ſeveral good remarks on the affinity of the ſounds of the letters; but they are founded rather on the different modes of articulation, or ſituation of organs during articulation, and therefore more explicit and intelligible.

This affinity and ſimilarity of ſounds, may be a ſubject worthy the curioſity and inveſtigation of a philoſopher; but their diſtinction, difference and ſeparation, form the great object of the practical linguiſt.

Of this particular ſound, little needs be ſaid, as it is familiar to moſt languages. The French have it in Dôme, os, repos, faûne, maux, faulx.

No. XXIII. of the Alphabet, or VI. of the Dictionary. This ſound, variouſly denoted in letters, by u, eu, ue, ew, and even eau, as in duty, feud, true, new, beauty, when ſlowly uttered, is evidently a compound, as obſerved in the Introduction, of the long i and ſhort u; but when pronounced ſharp and quick with a ſingle effort of the voice, is no longer a diphthong, but a ſufficiently ſingle and uniform ſyllable; whoſe quality is diſtinctly heard in the words above-mentioned; as alſo in the French words du, une, unir, prune, eu.

No. XXIV. of the Alphabet, or X. and XI. of the Dictionary. Expreſſed in letters by a, au, ua, ſhort, as in hand, barr'd, and long, as in hard, guard, laugh, is a ſound common to moſt languages. The French have it ſhort in alla, race, faſſe; long in abattre, grace, age, &c. The Italians have it long in padre, madre; and ſhort in ma, la, allegro, and a vaſt number of other words. It is ſomewhat ſurpriſing, that men of letters, and ſome of them even reſiding in the Metropolis, ſhould miſtake the ſimple and genuine application of of this ſound. "The native ſound of A, ſays Dr. Bayly, is broad, deep, and long, as in all, aw, war, daub; but it hath generally a mixed ſound, as in man, Bath, Mary, fair, which are ſounded as if written maen, baeth, &c." But who, except flirting females and affected fops pronounce man, and Bath, as if they were written maen, baeth, or like Mary, fair, &c.

As to the broad, deep and long ſound in all, awe, &c. I know not why it ſhould be called the native ſound of the letter A, any more than the preſent hard and open ſound: the latter is full as often, and perhaps more often, uſed in the Engliſh tongue, than the former; and I believe it will be difficult to make out any natural affinity or connection between letters and ſounds at all.

No. XXV. of the Alphabet, or XII. and XIII. of the Dictionary. Denoted by the letters e, ea, ai, a, ay. Short as in met, ſpread, ſaid; long, as in mate, maid, ſay. This ſlender ſound, when long, of the letter a, as it is frequently called, is likewiſe ſaid to be peculiar to the Engliſh tongue. The ſhort ſound, indeed, is nearly or quite the ſame as the French give to their e in the words elle, net, poët, &c. At the ſame time it is obſervable they give it to the combinations ei and ai, and oi, as in pleine, plaine, diſoit, &c. The French extend it alſo nearly as much as the Engliſh long ſound in the words nès, dez, clefs, parler, fondés, amai, dirai, &c.

The ſhort ſound, however, is, in Engliſh, generally imputed to the letter e, as pronounced in met, let, end, mend, &c. But it hath already been ſhewn that the long ſound of the Engliſh e, as pronounced in the monoſyllables he, me, ſhe, feet, meet, mean, &c. is not of the ſame quality as the ſhort ſound of the e in met, let, &c. but is the protracted ſound of the ſhort i, or of ee, as in fit, feet, &c. The protracted or long ſound of the ſhort e, as in met, let, &c. is in fact the ſlender ſound of the a, ſaid to be peculiar to the Engliſh, and which is in both French and Engliſh moſt frequently denoted in writing by e, a, ei, ai, oi, and ay.

It may here be neceſſary to adverti ſe the ſpeaker again of the miſtaken practice of the provinces, in uſing this long ſound of the e, or ſlender ſound of the a, inſtead of the protracted ſound of the ſhort i, No. XIV. of the Dictionary: and that the rather becauſe I obſerve that Dr. Bayly, and others, ſeem to authoriſe this corrupt method of pronunciation; "In words, ſays this laſt mentioned writer, having an e final, the e is mute, and ſheweth only to lengthen another vowel, thus make and take, are to be pronounced as if written meak and teak, as in eat, break, ſpeak." I can yet hardly conceive, that this learned writer meant to ſay that make and take have the ſame quality of ſound as eat, break, ſpeak; and yet there muſt be ſome miſconception, as the three words laſt exemplified are not uſually pronounced by good ſpeakers in the ſame manner. Break is generally ſounded like brake, make, take but few, except the natives of Ireland or the provinces, ſay ate, ſpake; but eat, ſpeak agreeably to the 14th ſound of the Dictionary.

Before this ſound be diſmiſſed, it may not be improper to notice, that the rule laid down by Grammarians, viz. that the e before a final conſonant is frequently mute, is badly exemplified. Dr. Bayly brings the words takes, every, open, mixed, expreſſed, as examples, and ſays they are pronounced as if written teaks, evn, opn, expreſſd, mixd. Now the caſe of theſe words is ſeverally very different. In the third perſon ſingular of verbs, and other words ending in es, the e is indeed as often mute, as it can well be made ſo; thus in the monoſyllables takes, gives, loves, it is totally ſilent; but in words places, hedges, ditches, &c. it is heard and makes them words of two ſyllables. It cannot be otherwiſe. In like manner in the words even and open above exemplified, it is impoſſible the e ſhould be entirely ſilent. It is ſoftened and thus rendered obſcure, as to its quality, but it ſtill retains its exiſtence as a ſyllable, nor can thoſe words be pronounced with any propriety as monoſyllables.

Again, as to the participle paſſives, expreſs'd, mix'd, the e is not ſilent in thoſe words. It is taken away by eliſion both in writing and ſpeech; the d being always in the latter, if not in the former, converted into a t. I appeal to the organs of any Engliſhman, whether expreſs'd, mix'd, are not always pronounced expreſt, mixt, and whether the d can be pronounced with any diſtinctneſs, without the addition of a ſyllable.

No. XXVI. of the Alphabet, or XVI. of the Dictionary. This ſound is typified by i or y, ui or ie, as in I, why, nigh, guide, fie. As at preſent uttered by the beſt ſpeakers in the metropolis, it is the ſharpeſt, ſhrilleſt, and cleareſt vowel in our language; altho it has the appearance, when ſlowly pronounced of being a compound of the a or e and i. I do not know that any other language has it equally clear, ſingle and diſtinct. I have elſewhere obſerved that our Scotiſh linguiſts ſay it has the ſound uſually denoted by awee, but the errour of this is obvious to every Engliſhman. The French, however, come near it in the Interjection ahi! which they pronounce quickly as one ſyllable, without the naſal twang, that attends the words fin, vin, and ſome others, bearing a near reſemblance.

SECTION IV.

Of the Nature of Engliſh Syllables.

I have before obſerved that a ſyllable differs from a mere vowel, in that the latter conſiſts of a ſimplicity in the quality of its ſound; whereas a ſyllable conſiſts in an unity of utterance; and is ſo far juſtly defined by Dr. Lowth. "A ſyllable, ſays he, is a ſound either ſimple or compounded, pronounced by a ſingle impulſe of the voice.

Under the head of Articulation, I have juſt hinted alſo the difficulty of preſerving this unity of utterance in ſpeaking Engliſh; on account of the numerous conſonants with which it abounds, and the very harſh ſequences of ſometimes ſeveral of them in one ſyllable, as in helm, whelm, ſtrength, breath, &c.* At the ſame time I took notice of the pretended diphthongs in our tongue, and of the whimſical practice of calling words, having two diſtinct ſounds both in number and quality, monoſyllables; ſuch as mare, mere, mire, fire, hire, &c. As cuſtom, however, has ranked all theſe words in the claſs of monoſyllables, and it therefore behoves every good ſpeaker to pronounce them if poſſible with a ſingle impulſe of the voice, a moſt ſtrange mixture of long and ſhort ſounds muſt neceſſarily enter into the number of Engliſh ſyllables.

In languages where the length of the ſyllable depends principally on the length of the vowel, no ſuch variety can ſubſiſt; nor will the ſpeaker be under the neceſſity of keeping up the volubility, or preſerving the modulation of his diſcourſe, by ſinking, or precipitately hurrying over, ſome words, becauſe he is compelled to dwell ſo much longer or more forcibly on others.

This neceſſity is remarkable in ſpeaking Engliſh, in ſo much that, beſides having recourſe to two kinds of ſyllabic accents, to diſtinguiſh ſignificant words and ſyllables, we even vary the quality of the ſounds of the ſame ſyllables when they are particularly ſignificant, and when they are otherwiſe: not but that other languages have what grammarians call their enclitics and atonics, i. e. ſuch words, which if taken ſingly have an accent, as all others have, but by their conſtruction in a ſentence either transfer or entirely loſe it. It is indeed declared by ſome writers to be "A great abſurdity, and contrary to the nature of all languages, that the ſame word when pronounced ſeparately ſhould be ſubject to a different modulation from what it muſt have, when it makes part of a continued diſcourſe." But, "If this be true," ſays Mr. Foſter, "the whole doctrine of atonics and enclitics ſinks at once. For thoſe words are ſaid to have an accent when pronounced ſingly, and often to have none, when they make part of a diſcourſe. How far this is contrary to the nature of all languages, I can by no means judge, becauſe I am acquainted but with few. But ſure I am, it is not contrary to our own: in which we hardly ever utter a ſentence without omitting the accent of ſome words, particularly pronouns and articles, and ſeveral monoſyllables, which yet we accent, when we uſe them ſingly, or emphatically. Our verb is we make ſometimes an enclitic like the Greek ἐστὶ, and ſometimes an oxytone. When I ſay, "the man is virtuous," the accent of is ſinks, as in ἀγαθος ἐστι. If in anſwer to a queſtion I ſay, "he is," the accent is preſerved, as in ἐστὶ. So our indefinite one is uſed in this reſpect like τις, ſhould one ſee a man: one here loſes its accent, and transfers it to ſhould, as in ἤν τις ἴδῃ ἄνθρωπον. But you cannot uſe the interrogative who without an accent, and ſo τις the interrogative conſtantly and properly has it. Thus likewiſe our pronouns are enclitics or not, according to their ſenſe. If I ſay, ſend me that book, me is here a perfect enclitic, and is pronounced almoſt as if it were joined with ſend, thus, ſend me. But when I ſay, ſend me the book, do not give it him: here me hath its proper accent, as in contradiſtinction to him †."

* See page 5.

It

It is to be obſerved, however, that the accent here inſiſted on is the oratorial, and not the ſyllabic accent; a diſtinction juſtly made elſewhere by the learned critic himſelf. The oratorial accent, or what the Engliſh uſually call emphaſis, muſt be common to all languages; but the ſyllabic is not ſo neceſſary to languages of ſimple and open utterance, whoſe ſyllables are not clogged, as ours and all the northern languages are, with a multiplicity of conſonants. In the French, for inſtance, there is no ſuch need of the ſyllabic accent as in the Engliſh. With us, as I juſt now obſerved, we are not only obliged to have recourſe to ſyllabic accents, but with the adoption of the ſtrongeſt of the oratorical, we are ſtill obliged even to ſuppreſs, and in ſo doing to vary the quality of the ſound of many of our ſyllables; in order to get forward with a whole ſentence in any reaſonable time, or with any tolerable modulation. Hence it is that our colloquy differs ſo much from our declamation. I do not mean altogether in the ſame manner as the language of French converſation differs from their language in repeating their verſes; but in ſome degree like it: that is, we ſink the clear ſound of the vowel, whatever it be, whether a, e, i, o, or u, into that indiſtinct and half ſound, which is marked by a cypher in the Dictionary. This is peculiarly obſervable in the almoſt expletive uſe of all the articles and pronouns exemplified above; it is farther obſervable in ſuch words, as begin with a prepoſition, many of which are marked in the following Dictionary, indifferently, either with the colloquial or the oratorial mode of pronunciation, thus in the words commune, communicate, &c. the full ſound is given to the firſt ſyllable, which is accordingly marked N° 7, although in common diſcourſe we ſink the firſt vowel, and pronounce it nearly as if written cummùne, cummùnicate, &c. It is in Engliſh nevertheleſs, as in all other languages, one may expoſe one's ignorance by running into the colloquial mode of pronunciation, and can only run the riſk of being thought a ſcholar or a pedant by ſtrictly abiding by the declamatory mode. There is another riſk too in adopting the colloquial mode; which is that, if you do not happen to fall on the local dialect or exact patavinity of the place, you will not be at all underſtood by the vulgar: the caſe of languages or rather ſpeech, being quite contrary to that of ſcience. In the former, the ignorant underſtand the learned better than the learned do the ignorant: in the latter it is otherwiſe.

This great diverſity, in the nature of Engliſh ſyllables, has occaſioned a mode of diſtinguiſhing them, which though derived from the ſame ſource as the language itſelf, does not appear to have taken place among the diſtinctions of the Greek and Latin Grammarians. But the conſideration of this quality will come with greater propriety under the head of Engliſh Proſody.

SECTION V.

Of the Compoſition of Engliſh Polyſyllables.

Having gone through the ſeveral modes of articulation, and diſtinct ſpecies of elementary ſounds in the Engliſh tongue, with the nature of monoſyllables, I ſhall proceed to conſider the manner of their connection in the compoſition of polyſyllables.

I have already obſerved, in remarking the difference between words and ſyllables, that the ſignificancy annexed to the one in the compoſition of the other, renders their preciſe articulation particularly neceſſary. To this end nothing is more requiſite, eſpecially for ſuch as would learn to ſpeak our language by reading it, than to acquire the true method of pronouncing monoſyllables, and dividing words into ſyllables as they are really pronounced. As to the pronunciation of monoſyllables, abſtracted from their oratorical accent, or the emphaſis they are variouſly ſubject to in diſcourſe; nothing more, I preſume, need be added to what has been already obſerved, reſpecting the clear intonation of the vowels, and the quick and forcible utterance of the conſonants.

In regard to the diviſion of polyſyllables, it is attended with greater difficulty, and will hardly ever be attained by attending to the rules generally laid down for this purpoſe.

Among theſe are ſome remarkably erroneous. The firſt, as I have already obſerved *, is "that a conſonant between two vowels belongs to the latter ſyllable;" thus adage, agony, alum, baniſh, body, &c. are divided in ſpelling thus, a-dage, a-gony, a-lum, ba-niſh, bo-dy, though they are really pronounced ad-age, ag-ony, al-um, ban-iſh, &c.

The next general rule among our ſpelling-maſters is, that "two conſonants in the middle of a word which are proper to begin a word, muſt begin the following ſyllable together." Now ſk, ſp, ſt, th, and others are proper to begin words; but are the words muſket, whiſper, cluſter, mother, divided in pronunciation as they would be thus abſurdly, mu-ſket, whi-ſper, clu-ſter, mo-ther? Surely not!

As an exception to this rule, it is further inculcated, that dl, kl, and tl, though improper to begin words, yet begin ſyllables, as in cradle, myrtle, rankle: but this is true only in written language; the final vowel in the above words being always ſounded in ſpeech before the l.

Theſe defects of our rules for ſpelling words, particularly radicals, will ſerve to confirm the utility of the preſent undertaking; which would even render them uſeleſs were they perfect. Not but that ſome of theſe rules might be uſeful with regard to the derivatives; which we are juſtly taught to divide according to their originals or primitives: thus ſtand-ard, herb-age, gold-en, act-or, monument-al, &c. And yet when the radical word is ſucceeded in the derivative by a vowel, as in the above caſes, it matters little, whether ſuch derivatives are divided according to the ſenſe or the ſound; eſpecially if the radical ends in two conſonants, as in the inſtances given†. Thus, whether we pronounce ſtan-dard, her-bage, gol-den, ac-tor, or ſtand-ard, herb-age, gold-en, act-or, it differs little if the words be underſtood: for indeed in theſe caſes we frequently ſo pronounce them, as being more agreeable to the ear, than if the radical were entirely ſounded firſt, and its addition afterwards. And hence it is that, in endeavouring to adapt our writing to our ſpeaking, we double a ſingle conſonant in ſuch caſes, giving it both to the former ſyllable and the latter: thus we write blot-ted, pot-tage, rot-ten, rub-ber, abet-tor, &c. There ſeems, however, as little reaſon for the repetition of the conſonant in ſuch words, as there does for it in giver, lover, and many others; if we attend merely to the pronunciation.

* See page 9.

† Thus in the following Dictionary, words of this kind are divided ſometimes one way and ſometimes another; although for the moſt part the ſyllables of compound words are diſtinguiſhed by the only good rule, that of reducing them into their primitives.

It is ſaid that primitives taking only y after them, of which we have many in the Engliſh tongue, take moſt of the preceding conſonants into the latter ſyllable, as is done in worthy, which is generally pronounced wor-thy; but this muſt not be conſidered as a general rule: for we do not ſay ear-thy for earth-y; though we pronounce both the radicals earth and worth exactly alike *. It is farther obſervable, that in the above mentioned inſtance, the word wor-thy is not only divided contrary to the general rule of etymology, but that the th takes its ſoft ſound in the derivative, though it retains its hard one in the radical. Indeed the changeability of the hard and ſoft ſounds of the conſonants in our language is ſo great and ſo uncertain, that it is impoſſible to lay down any kind of general rule for determining it, that would not be attended with numerous exceptions.

The uſe of the methods taken in the following Dictionary, therefore, to point out the diviſion of polyſyllables, and the hard or ſoft ſound of the conſonants, is as obvious, as that of pointing out the ſound of the vowels.

The misfortune is, that ſuch is the fluctuating ſtate of all living languages, we are after all in ſome degree catching at a ſhadow, and endeavouring to deſcribe the form of a cloud, which the wind diverſifies every moment; I am not, however, ſo ready to allow the propriety, or admit of the neceſſity, of all theſe changes, as has been ſometimes done. The learned Doctor Foſter, in his Eſſay on Accent and Quantity before quoted, obſerves that the actual pronunciation of words in all languages alters in ſome caſes in a few years. Among ourſelves, ſays he, "the word ally was four or five years ago † pronounced as an oxytone ally; and any grammarian, who had then laid the accent on the laſt ſyllable would have been right: now by many perſons of very good ſenſe the ſame word is pronounced as a barytone ally; and a grammarian who ſhould now place the accent on the firſt ſyllable, would do right too." The truth of this learned writer's obſervation with reſpect to the changeability of languages in general I admit; but not of the propriety of the variation in the particular inſtance adduced. There are indeed ſimilar inſtances by which that propriety may ſeem ſupported; thus the word perfume was formerly accented on the firſt ſyllable; it is now, and has long been, accented on the laſt; and I think with propriety, becauſe the ſyllable now accented is the radical and moſt ſignificant ſyllable in the word. It is otherwiſe with the word ally, even if no objection could be made to its reſembling the word alley, when accented on the firſt ſyllable. Of late years, it is true, we have affected, with ſome ſhew of propriety too, to lay the accent on the firſt ſyllable of the ſame diſyllables uſed as nouns, which take it on the laſt when uſed as verbs. But this practice is far from being univerſal; nor have we any good reaſon for making it ſo. The word perfume, for inſtance generally takes the accent on the laſt ſyllable whether uſed as a ſubſtantive or a verb; yet according to this practice the accent ſhould be laid on the firſt ſyllable when uſed as a noun.

* In conſidering only the pronunciation of words, i. e. as they are compounded of diſtinct articulate voices, nothing can be more abſurd than the inconſiſtent method of the grammarians, in dividing words into ſyllables one way, and directing their pronunciation, as compounds of particular voices, another. Thus we are taught to pronounce the following words, as in the firſt column, and to divide them into ſyllables, in ſpelling, as in the ſecond.

The Roman rule, reſpecting diſyllables, is ſaid to be that of laying the accent on the former ſyllable; which has been adopted by moſt grammarians: but they have been reduced to the neceſſity of admitting ſo many exceptions that the rule itſelf is evidently uſeleſs.

SECTION VI.

Of Engliſh Proſody.

I have taken ſome notice of proſody in a preceeding ſection, as it relates immediately to verſification; but there is a modulation or melody of tones in proſaic diſcourſe as well as in verſe: nay it is on the former that the latter is moſt naturally founded.

It is about the nature of this modulation that the learned ſo greatly differ. The deſire of accomodating the rules of the ancient Greek and Latin to modern Engliſh, hath occaſioned a world of perplexity; not the leaſt part of which hath ariſen from the miſapplication of the uſe of the accent.

By accent the ancients meant an elevation or depreſſion of the voice on particular ſyllables. Of theſe the Greeks had three kinds; the acute, which marked an elevation of voice; the grave, which denoted its depreſſion; and the circumflex, which expreſſed both an elevation and depreſſion on the ſame ſyllable. It is hence very evident that the common diſcourſe of the ancients muſt have been more muſical, or have a nearer relation to ſinging than modern tongues; eſpecially as they are pronounced in great towns by poliſhed ſpeakers. Perhaps our modern improvements in muſick have contributed not a little to baniſh chaunt from common diſcourſe: but, from whatever cauſe it has happened, certain it is that a monotony, ſo far as relates to the variation of high and low, prevails in all modern poliſhed converſation.

This want of diverſity of muſical tone, however, is amply ſupplied in Engliſh by a variety in the ſtreſs laid on particular ſyllables; which are pronounced more or leſs forcibly, louder or ſofter, as occaſion requires. Nor do we find any want of variety in this mode of modulation, eſpecially as we have alſo all the variety of long and ſhort, which the learned call quantity.

* See Maſon on the power of numbers.

Much

Much diſpute indeed hath ariſen among writers on this ſubject, about the relation between modern accent and quantity. It is generally allowed that the ancient accent and quantity were different things; but, ſays a late writer on this ſubject "it is impoſſible any ſuch diſtinction between the accents and quantities can be obſerved in Engliſh"* Dr. Johnſon alſo tells us that accent and quantity in Engliſh are the ſame; to which opinion Dr. Foſter accedes and thinks it deciſive. But if this be the caſe our quantity muſt be different from what was called quantity among the ancients, it muſt not conſiſt merely of time That accent in Engliſh verſe ſupplies the place of quantity is certain; but how far does it ſo? an accented ſyllable is arbitrarily admitted to ſupply the place of a long ſyllable, and muſt not be placed in the room of a ſhort one: but the effect of acute-accented ſyllables, though admitted to ſupply the place of long ſyllables in the mechanical conſtruction of the verſe, is by no means the ſame as that of ſo many long ſyllables or ſyllables having the grave accent.

Strength may be allowed to ſupply the place of length, but the beauty of the modulation or harmony of the verſe will be widely different. It is therefore a great miſtake to uſe the accent and long quantity indiſcriminately, as if they would have the ſame effect in numerous compoſition.

Almoſt all our Engliſh writers on this ſubject, poſſeſſed with this inchangeability of accent and quantity, tell us that all accented ſyllables are long; making at the ſame time no diſtinction between the grave and the acute accent. Dr. Foſter ſays, "the coincidence of the acute and long quantity on the ſame ſyllable, is moſt uſual with us in the pronunciation of our own language; which will be admitted by any one, who with this view attends to the ſound of an Engliſh voice." But how does this agree with what he himſelf advances reſpecting the nature of the acute. "The account, which I have attempted to give, of the true nature and power of the acute tone, is confirmed by what Ariſtotle, de Anima, in his chapter περὶ ψόφου καὶ ἀκοῆς, ſays, Τὸ μὲν Ὀξὺ κινεῖ τὴν αἴσθησιν ἐν ὀλίγῳ χρόνῳ ἐπὶ πολύ· τὸ δὲ Βαρὺ, ἐν πολλῷ ἐπ' ὀλίγον. Acutus ſonus movet ſenſum in brevi tempore plurimum: Gravis vero, in multo paulum. Again, in another place: τῷ ἐν φωνῇ Ὀξέος ὄντος καὶ ἅμα τὸ ὀλίγον——τὸ δὲ Ὀξὺ δι' ὀλιγότητα, ἅμα ταχύ. Cum Acutus in voce exiſtat breviter.—Acutus, propter brevitatem, vel levitatem, velox.

It appears hence on the beſt authority, than an acute tone and a long quantity did by no means coincide among the ancients *. Why then ſhould it be ſuppoſed to do ſo among the moderns? Let us ſuppoſe accent to be even expreſſive rather of the ſtreſs or force of voice than the elevation of it; even in this caſe a quick utterance is inſeparably attached to the acute and a ſlow utterance to the grave accent. I am perſuaded that whoever attends carefully to Engliſh pronunciation, will find this rule to be invariable.

Thoſe accented ſyllables, therefore, which are ſounded ſharp and quick, we diſtinguiſh by the acute accent; and thoſe, which are pronounced flat and ſlow, by the grave accent.

Not that the diſtinction of quick and ſlow, or long and ſhort, ſyllables, is ſolely that which conſtitutes metrical quantity in Engliſh. As a ſyllable differs from a mere vowel, ſo doth a metrical foot differ from a ſyllable. It is true that, in Engliſh, we generally reckon as many many feet in a verſe as there are ſyllables; but not always: and we have ſome ten-feet verſes, as they are called, which contain twelve, and even fourteen, ſyllables in a line; for example,

* Perhaps Dr. Foſter meant, by the acute in the firſt inſtance, the ſlender ſound of ſome of our vowels; but tone has little or nothing to do with the articulate quality of ſounds.

And many an amorous, many a humorous lay;
Which many a bard had chanted many a day.

and again,

——————The wounded bull
Roar'd bellowing, whilſt rebellowing rang the woods.

It is the aptitude for ſucceſſion, or the metrical flow, of ſyllables after each other, that conſtitutes them feet, or elementary parts of numerous compoſition; the characteriſtic of a foot being the relations in which it ſtands to the preceeding or ſucceeding ſyllable.

Theſe relations are various and depend partly on the natural modulation of voice in diſcourſe or oratorial declamation; and partly on the arbitrary modulations of poeſy or artificial verſification.

As to proſaic feet, which ſome authors have attempted to reduce to the ſtandard of poetic meaſures, their relations admit of ſuch a boundleſs variety, that I ſhall not repeat the vain attempt to ſubject them to rules; whoſe multiplicity would ſerve only to perplex the ſpeaker, that ſhould want a good ear; and to one of a good ear would be altogether needleſs. Poetical meaſures are more eaſily reducible to a ſtandard.

SECTION VII.

Of Poetical Meaſures.

By poetical meaſures I do not mean any number of ſyllables, joined together in the compoſition of what the ancients called a foot; becauſe I do not find that our Engliſh verſes are reducible to ſuch elements, and therefore think it abſurd to ſay they are compoſed of them.

Mr. Maſon indeed, has taken much pains to ſcan and decompoſe ſome favorite Engliſh verſes, with this view; which I the rather admire at, as he is all the while compelled to uſe a ſtratagem ſimilar to that of Procruſtes, in contracting, or lengthening out, the numbers to his imaginary ſtandard. The ſame writer alſo, in treating of the quantity of Engliſh numbers, expreſſes himſelf thus. "The truth is, there is a very wide difference between the Latin and Engliſh Proſody. And it is in vain to think of introducing the rules of the former into the latter; ſince the Engliſh language is not ſo framed as to admit of it. This is very plain to thoſe who compare the proſody of the two languages; wherein they cannot avoid obſerving how eſſentially they contradict each other. For inſtance, one vowel before another in Engliſh is often long, in Latin almoſt always ſhort. A vowel before two conſonants in Engliſh is often ſhort, in Latin always long. And Diphthongs which are always long in the Latin, are often ſhort in the Engliſh tongue.

And

And yet to aſſert (as ſome have done) that we have therefore no certain determinate quantities in our language, is to ſap the very foundation of all Engliſh verſe; which is made up of meaſures, as they are of feet, which depend upon the determinate quantities of the ſyllables, whether long or ſhort. But if we have no ſuch determinate quantities, we can have no certain feet, conſequently no juſt meaſures, and therefore no verſe."

To deliver us from this predicament, Mr. Maſon proceeds, "The proper accent and emphaſis then, is the chief rule that determines the Engliſh quantities. And it is a rule not only more general, but more certain and unexceptionable than thoſe that are introduced into the ancient proſodia. For common uſe and cuſtom [Quem penes arbitrium eſt & jus & norma loquendi] will never fail to determine the accent; and the ſenſe of the period, when underſtood, will always point out the emphaſis; and where the accent or emphaſis is thus directed to fall, that ſyllable (be its natural quantity what it will) is in that place conſidered as long; and thoſe ſyllables that have neither accent nor emphaſis are conſidered as ſhort."

We find here the harmony of poetic numbers referred to the accent and emphaſis, depending on the ſenſe of the period. But, with this writer's leave, the harmony of numbers may be as compleat in a piece of compleat nonſenſe, as in the moſt ſenſible ſtanza that ever was penned. Indeed the words, in which this writer expreſſes himſelf, ſhew him to be quite wide of the mark. He ſays, "where the accent or emphaſis is directed by the ſenſe to fall, that ſyllable (be its natural quantity what it will) is in that place conſidered as long; and thoſe ſyllables that have neither accent nor emphaſis are conſidered as ſhort." In like manner Dr. Pemberton, in treating this ſubject, ſays emphaſis implies greater length in the ſyllable.

But we are here treating of a ſenſible and perceptible effect on the ear; and not on any thing to be conſidered or implied. What! have we no harmony of numbers in Engliſh poeſy but what depends on mere implication?

And yet it is in this implied imaginary quantity that Mr. Maſon ſays, "we have a certain rule or ſtandard whereby to meaſure and determine Engliſh numbers, to which we find all our beſt Engliſh poets exactly conform. But if after all," continues he, "ſome will inſiſt, that accent is not the quantity in Engliſh numbers, or if it be, it is no proper rule in this caſe; I would aſk, where they can find another; and what they imagine then to be the foundation of our meaſures, or in what manner they will account for the harmony of Engliſh verſe?"

As this gentleman is one of the lateſt Engliſh writers that have profeſſedly treated this ſubject, I ſhall endeavour to give his queſtion an anſwer.

The harmony of Engliſh verſe is partly natural and partly artificial. Its natural harmony depends on the diſtinct articulation *, eaſy flow and ſpirited intonation of its elements, or

* Diſtinct articulation I conceive, as before laid down, to be eſſential to the harmony, as it is eſſential to the preciſe audibility, of every language. It is in this reſpect that the Italian claims the ſuperiority of all other European languages. Is it not ſurprizing, therefore, that Baretti ſhould affect to prefer the Spaniſh, on account of its gutturality? The abſurdity of this affectation will appear ſtill ſtronger, on reflection, that the ſuperiority of the Italian tongue in point of harmony, is moſt diſtinguiſhable in ſinging; owing entirely to the greater ſimplicity of its utterance. Now, that language is unqueſtionably the beſt adapted to the purpoſes of muſick, whoſe feet: its artificial harmony on the regular diſpoſition or ſucceſſion of thoſe feet, according to certain arbitrary modes, habitual to the language.

With regard to poetic feet, or the elements of verſe in themſelves, they differ both in time and in force: and it is in the pleaſing commixture and interchangeability of the long and ſhort, loud and ſoft, ſyllables, that conſiſts the harmony of Engliſh numbers.

By loud and ſoft ſyllables, I mean accented ſyllables and unaccented ſyllables; whether by the ſyllabic or oratorial accent; the accent in Engliſh ſerving rather to give more forcible utterance, or to pronounce the ſyllable louder, and not in a higher key; as was the caſe of accent among the ancients and is too frequently miſunderſtood by the moderns.

Indeed Mr. Maſon himſelf does not ſufficiently explain what he means by accent and emphaſis, when he ſays, "they determine the quantity of Engliſh verſe." In ſome parts of his work he calls accent and emphaſis the raiſing of the voice; and, in diſtinguiſhing the ancient accent from quantity, he calls the firſt the ſound of the voice, and quantity the length of the time. But what can be meant by the ſound of the voice? Is it the key, note or tone? If ſo, it does not enter into the conſideration of Engliſh quantity at all. Indeed this writer hath himſelf, by a happy alluſion, hit off a very appoſite reply, to his own queſtion. "The drum, ſays he, is an inſtrument which in a wonderful manner ſhews the force and power of poetic numbers; for though its ſound be only a monotony, yet it exactly expreſſes all the different qualities of the ſeveral feet. And when we beat thoſe numbers upon it, only by varying the movement into quicker or ſlower, and making the ſound ſtronger or ſofter, the mind is affected as much as it is by an inſtrument, that runs all the notes of the Gamut."

Need this author to have aſked, in what manner we can account for the harmony of Engliſh verſe, without having recourſe to accent and emphaſis?

So far, it is true, as accent and emphaſis are confined merely to force of utterance, and not elevation of tone, it is certain that they will ſupply the want of natural length in any ſyllable: ſo that the oratorial accent ſhould never counteract the harmony of the verſe, although it does not conſtitute that harmony. Some lines may poſſeſs all the harmony of verſe, while others of the ſame verſification (that is, ſucceſſion of naturally long and ſhort, accented and non-accented ſyllables) muſt either loſe their ſenſe or their harmony in recital, if the declamatory emphaſis fall in the place of a ſhort ſyllable *.

ſyllables admit of the cleareſt intonation, and leaſt affect the tone of the voice, in receiving the quality imparted to them by articulation. Every guttural naſal or palatial obſtruction tends to change the note as it is formed in paſſing out the wind pipe, and of courſe to impair the melody of ſong.

For the purpoſes of oratory, it may be ſaid that ſtrength is often preferable to ſweetneſs; but it is by no means clear that theſe two qualities are incompatable. Rouſſeau has very ſucceſsfully attempted to ſhew the contrary, in his treatiſe on the Italian muſick.

* Thus in the following line the antitheſis requires the oratorial emphaſis to be laid on the ninth foot, or ſyllable; which according to the metre ſhould be ſhort.

Tho you fled yours, maintain'd was ſtill my ground.

And yet, did not the ſenſe require the word my to be emphatically pronounced, the line would be good verſe, and my might be pronounced ſhort, as in the following line:

Tho you ran off, I ſtill maintain'd my ground.

In

It is in adapting the oratorial accent, or the natural ſtreſs of voice in declamation, to the artificial mechaniſm of the verſe, that conſiſts one of the greateſt beauties of poetry: this being in fact the reconciling of ſenſe to ſound in the moſt eſſential point. For, notwithſtanding the conſtruction of our various kind of verſes are artificial and arbitrary, they are become ſo habitual to an Engliſh ear, that, if they were written with due attention to the oratorial accent, the perpetual repetition of poetical meaſure would never be diſguſting in graceful recital.

The difficulty of reconciling the accents of natural or oratorial declamation with the rules of artificial verſification, has occaſioned innumerable breaches of the latter in our beſt and moſt admired poets. In many of theſe alſo, the writers have been happy enough to ſnatch a grace beyond the reach of art, and, by breaking through the regular trammels of artificial harmony, have given us ſomething infinitely more pleaſing and harmonious.

In what is uſually called heroic verſe in Engliſh, we have alternately a long and ſhort, or an accent and unaccented ſyllable regularly following each other, with a pauſe in the middle, and a cadence at the end of each line: and in proportion to the regularity of this ſucceſſion, pauſe and cadence, is the harmony of the verſe ſaid to be preſerved.

But who will ſay that the breach of this regularity in the following inſtance is not productive of an harmony ſuperior to the moſt regular verſification.

" —— Thammuz came next, behind,
Whoſe annual wound, in Lebanon, allur'd
The Syrian damſels, to lament his fate
In amorous ditties, all a ſummer's day;
While ſmooth Adonis, from his native rock,
Ran purple to the ſea.——
—— Harmony
So ſmooths her charming tones, that God's own ear
Liſtens delighted.

In the following ſtanza, we have a ſimilar example.

What though I have ſkill to complain,
And the muſes my temples have crown'd?
What though, when they hear my ſoft ſwain,
The ſiſters ſit weeping around?

Ah! Colin, 'tis all but in vain,
Thy pipe and the laurel reſign;
Thy fair one inclines to a ſwain,
Whoſe muſic is ſweeter than thine.

There are few verſes better written for muſic than theſe; and yet the word ſoft, in the third line of the firſt ſtanza, is long and emphatical. If the two ſtanzas be ſet to the ſame notes alſo, as is common in ballads, we find another impropriety, in that the word ſoft, in the third line of the firſt ſtanza, which is long and emphatical, is ſet to the ſame note as a in the third line of the ſecond, which has neither the oratorial nor the ſyllabic accent.

Might it not be ſaid of the numbers of theſe, and many other ſimilar paſſages in Milton, in the language of Comus,

How ſweetly do they float upon the wings
Of ſilence!
At every fall, ſmoothing the raven down
Of darkneſs, till it ſmiles ——
Such ſounds as theſe will take th'enchanted ſoul,
And lap it in Elyſium?"

It is not, however, from ſuch examples as theſe, ſuperior to all artifice, that we are to inveſtigate the rules of poeſy, as an art *.

The harmony of Engliſh verſification evidently ariſes from a pleaſing diverſification of long and ſhort, accented and unaccented ſyllables, conformable to the arbitrary rules laid down in the particular ſpecies of verſe, and not inconſiſtent with the oratorial accent or declamatory emphaſis, proper to the ſubject.

But the harmony of Engliſh verſe, as well as the elements of its compoſition, will be more fully diſplayed, in conſidering the nature of vocal melody, and the manner of adapting poetical feet to notes in muſick.

* Some writers indeed have made attempts of this kind, but with little ſucceſs. I ſhall mention one of Mr. Say, author of an Eſſay on the Harmony of numbers; with what I conceive a ſufficient proof of its futility.

There is a paſſage in Milton's Paradiſe Regained, wherein he introduces Satan, recommending to our Saviour, the ſtudy of the Athenian Orators

Thoſe ancient, whoſe reſiſtleſs eloquence
Wielded at will that fierce democratie,
Shook th' arſenal and fulmin'd over Greece;
To Macedon, and Artaxerxes' throne:

In expatiating on the beauty of theſe lines, Mr. Say obſerves that Milton hath here "deſcribed the haſty changes of the paſſions and counſels of the ancient orators, in the very movements of his verſe; at the ſame time expreſſing the Vim Demoſthenis, the force or vehemence of Demoſthenes, in the mere ſituation of the words fierce and reſiſtleſs, with an equal burſt of thunder ſhaking the arſenal and light'ning at once over Greece to Macedon, and the diſtant throne of Artaxerxes; that is, in the apprehenſion of thoſe ages, from one end of the earth to another, with a like vehemence, propriety, and Rapidity of numbers."

That theſe verſes contain much of that vehemence, propriety, and rapidity of expreſſion, which is imputed to them, is admitted: but that this depends on their verſification is denied. Certain it is, that the expreſſion of the following verſes is totally different, and yet there is exactly the ſame ſucceſſion of long and ſhort ſyllables, or the ſame metrical numbers in them as in the preceeding.

——The lofty ſhips
Rode buoyant o'er the liquid element,
Wafted by winds, that blew in ſymphony;
Not Goſſamers e'er wanton'd in the breeze
So placid, as her artificial wings.

The reader will ſee that, in this imitation, I have not taken the liberty to ſubſtitute accent for quantity; but have preſerved not only the ſame ſucceſſion of long and ſhort ſyllables, but have placed the very accents in the ſame parts of the lines, and have even imitated the quality of the ſounds, as far as the ſubject would admit.

We find none of the powers of Thunder and Lightning, that

Shook th' arſenal, and fulmin'd over Greece
To Macedon, and Artaxerxes' Throne;

in the numbers of the correſponding lines,

Not Goſſamers e'er wanton'd in the breeze
So placid, as her artificial wings.

And yet the ſyllabic accents, and even literal conſtruction of the ſyllables, are very nearly the ſame.

SEC-

SECTION VIII.

Of Vocal Melody.

By melody I mean that riſing and falling of the voice, together with the lengthening and ſhortening each ſyllable, in ſinging, conformably to notes in muſick.

Now, admitting the diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic between ſpeech and ſong to be abſence of melody or chaunt in the former, the harmony of poetic numbers, while confined to ſpeech or ſimple recitation, muſt be conſiſtent with an accentual monotony *. Not that this diſtinction appears to have ſubſiſted among the ancients, or even to ſubſiſt at this day among unpoliſhed nations, ignorant of the theory of muſick.

From the uſe of the Greek accents we are taught, that the Greeks muſt have had a kind of melody or chaunt, not only in the recital of their poetry, but in common diſcourſe. Indeed this ſeems to be confirmed, not only by what is related of their orators, but of their ſingers. Of the former it is ſaid, that "Foreigners uſed to liſten to them, though they did not underſtand their Language, with as much pleaſure as we do to the Italian ſingers, from the mere delight they took in the harmony of their utterance."

Of their ſingers, accompanied with inſtrumental muſick, we have ſtill more aſtoniſhing relations: and as the ſcience of harmony was then in a very imperfect ſtate, it is reaſonable to impute thoſe wonderful effects, as far as they are credible, rather to the merit of the poetical than the muſical compoſition. "I believe," ſays Mr. Aviſon "we may juſtly conclude, that the force and beauties of the ancient Muſic, did not conſiſt ſo much in artful Compoſitions, or in any ſuperiority of Execution in the Performance, as in the pure ſimplicity of its Melody; which being performed in Uniſons, by their vaſt choruſſes of Voices and Inſtruments, no wonder the moſt prodigious effects were produced. Since the time of Guido Aretino, the laws and principles of harmony have been conſiderably enlarged, and by rendering this Art more intricate and complex, have deprived it of thoſe plain, though ſtriking beauties, which, probably, almoſt every hearer could diſtinguiſh and admire. And, I don't know whether this will not go ſome way, towards determining the diſpute concerning the ſuperiour excellence of ancient and modern muſic. It is to be obſerved, that the Ancients, when they ſpeak of its marvellous effects, generally conſider it as an adjunct to poetry. Now, an art in its progreſs to its own abſolute perfection, may arrive at ſome intermediate point, which is its point of perfection, conſidered as an art joined to another art; but not to its own, when taken ſeparately. If the ancients, therefore, carried Melody to its higheſt perfection, it is probable they puſhed the muſical art as far as it would go, conſidered as an adjunct to poetry: but harmony is the perfection of muſick, as a ſingle ſcience. Hence then we determine the ſpecific difference between the ancient and modern compoſitions, and conſequently their excellency."

* That is, ſo far as reſpects the feet of the verſe. The cadence of the periods will cauſe a little riſe and fall in the recital.

The

The improvement of muſick, as a ſcience, has hence evidently made a more diſtant ſeparation between muſick and poetry; the latter being now rather conſidered as an adjunct to the former; at leaſt in our modern operas and oratorios.

Whether preciſion or propriety of ſpeech hath been equally improved by the rejection of chaunt in elocution and poetry, I ſhall not pretend to ſay; but it is plain that, the improvement of muſick taking a very different route to that of ſpeech or poetic compoſition, they cannot be ſuch cloſe adjuncts at preſent as they were among the ancient Greeks. They are, however, far from being ſo diſtant and incompatible as is generally imagined. The author juſt quoted obſerves that "The tunes which were played to odes like thoſe of Horace, muſt have been plain and ſimple, becauſe of the ſpeedy return of the ſame ſtanza, and becauſe of the quantity of the ſyllables, which was not to be violated, or at leaſt, not greatly by the muſic. The modern muſicians who have attempted to ſet ſuch Latin or Greek odes to muſic, have often too much neglected this rule of ſuiting the tune to the metre, and have made long ſyllables ſhort and ſhort ſyllables long, and run diviſions upon ſingle ones, and repeated ſome of the words."

"In modern vocal muſic we regard not this law, but perpetually ſacrifice the quantity to the modulation; which yet ſurely is a fault: but the fault is partly, if not principally in our language, a language harſh and unmuſical, and full of conſonants, and of ſyllables long by poſition."

It is ſurprizing that an author of ſo much critical acumen on this ſubject as Mr. Aviſon, ſhould not be ſtruck with the abſurdity of ſyllables being long or ſhort by poſition. They are ſo, indeed, as before obſerved, by implication? But what has implication to do in a caſe that immediately applies to the determination of the ſenſe? Are any of thoſe ſyllables, that are made long or ſhort by poſition, really made ſo in the graceful or intelligible recital of the verſe? By no means. It is not requiſite that a verſe or line, containing a certain number of ſyllables, ſhould be repeated in any certain time; as ſeems to be imagined by ſuch writers as conſtantly diſtinguiſh with marks of eliſion ſuch unaccented ſyllables, as, ſounded ſoftly or readily flowing into each other, are only equivalent to a ſingle foot in a verſe. Thus the line above quoted,

And many an amorous many a humorous lay,

they would write thus,

And man' an am'rous man' a hum'rous lay, leſt they ſhould be thought to have put too many feet into the verſe.

But the harmonious recital of verſification requires no ſuch eliſions; it demands, as well as the ſenſe, the audible utterance of every ſyllable. It is ſufficient that the accented and unaccented feet follow each other in the requiſite order; the diverſification of the forte and piano, or the loud and ſoft, mode of utterance, being ſufficient to conſtitute the harmony of verſification.

Now, if the length of ſyllables are not really changed by implication or poſition, in the harmonious recital of verſe; why ſhould it be ſuppoſed neceſſary to change them, becauſe the verſe is ſet to muſick? It is neceſſary that the words ſhould be heard in ſinging as well as in ſpeech; otherwiſe words are uſeleſs and vocal muſick ridiculous. They are not rendered intelligible alſo by their being adapted to the rules of verſification; but by their natural and oratorial delivery. Should a muſical compoſer, therefore, ſet ſyllables ſounded in diſcourſe naturally long, though ſhort by poſition or implication, he would go the ready way to render the words unintelligible, and of courſe deviate from the direct path to the muſical expreſſion of Song.

It has been generally obſerved, by writers on this ſubject, in ſpeaking of verſes written for muſick, that the muſical compoſer ſhould adapt the length of the notes and ſyllables to each other. But the misfortune is, that, if the compoſer were to attempt this, and to judge of the length of ſyllables by the artificial rules of common proſody, they would be liable to err much farther than they now do by not troubling themſelves about it.

Aviſon affords us a proof of this in his obſervation on the Alexis of Dr. Pepuſch, a very fine cantata in which we have this line;

"Charm-ing — ſounds — that ſweet-ly — languiſh, Theſe ſyllables, ſays he, are, according to the laws of proſody, all long, except the ſixth. In the muſic you have a demi-quaver to the ſecond, a quaver to the third, &c. and the ſinger is obliged to ſhorten long ſyllables, as well as he can."

Now; the truth is, there are but three ſyllables in the above mentioned line that ought to be uttered long, either in recital or ſinging.

I ſhall cite another example of the like kind from Mr. Maſon. The following verſes he calls Anapœſtic, and ſcans them thus,

With hearts bold and ſtout,
We'll repel the vile rout,
And follow fair liberty's call;
We'll ruſh on the foe,
And deal death in each blow,
'Till conqueſt and honour, crown all.

According to this method of ſcanning, the words bold, we'll, vile, fair, deal, each, crown, which are naturally long ſyllables, and moſt of them emphatical beſides, are yet ſet to a ſhort note. On the other hand, the laſt ſyllable in repel is made long, though naturally ſhort, and not to be lengthened by the accent; as are alſo the firſt ſyllables in follow, liberty, conqueſt, and honour; all of the ſame nature. Nothing, ſurely, can be more palpable than the abſurdity of making pel long in the very ſame line in which vile is made ſhort! The ſame may be ſaid of deal and death; the former of which is made ſhort, and the latter long.

The

The curious reader, who will take the trouble of reciting the above verſes, lengthening and ſhortening the ſyllables as they are ſcanned, will find that he pronounces them nearly as a North-Briton would do; whoſe pronunciation of the Engliſh language follows the artificial rules, by which he is taught to pronounce the Latin.

For theſe reaſons it is that, though the muſical compoſer ſhould be attentive to the natural length of the ſyllables, in ſetting words to muſick, he is not to judge of that length by any artificial rules of proſody laid down in books, but from their ſound in common diſcourſe or oratorial declamation; of which he is to judge by his ear; which, if a good one, is preferable to all rules to be drawn from the combination of literal vowels and conſonants.

There is ſtill another circumſtance, neceſſary to be taken into the conſideration of the muſical compoſer; which is derived from the eſſence of poetical numbers. It has been ſhewn that force or energy of ſound ſupplies the want of time in verſification, and that even an addition of time may be admitted on the diminution of ſuch force or energy.

On the giving, therefore, a proper and proportional energy to the ſound of every ſyllable or foot in a verſe, muſt in a great meaſure depend the muſical expreſſion of ſong.

This taſk indeed is generally left to the ſinger; but, if the compoſer be not himſelf attentive both to the ſyllabic and oratorial accent of the words, he will frequently put it out of the ſinger's power to diſcharge this duty. Thus, if he ſets, a long or emphatical ſyllable to a ſhort and ſinking note, the finger cannot poſſibly give it that energy, which it ought to bear in the period: whereas the compoſer, by properly attending to accent and emphaſis, may give energy to any ſyllable, either by raiſing or lengthening the note, as his ſubject will beſt admit.

Mr. Maſon, author of Elfrida, obſerves that the different cadences, &c. without which modern muſick cannot ſubſiſt, are totally improper for the expreſſion of poetry. By poetical expreſſion, however, he ſeems to mean the artificial ti-tum-ti of modern verſe; which, to ſay truth, being merely arbitrary and not very harmonious, is hardly worth preſerving, to the loſs of that expreſſive harmony which is founded on muſical ſcience. We find it, nevertheleſs, tolerably well preſerved in many of our Engliſh ballad meaſures, without interfering very ſenſibly with the muſical ſubject. The ten feet, or heroic meaſure is more incongruous; but then it can be more eaſily diſpenſed with; ſo that, if the emphaſis and cadences of oratorial declamation were ſolely attended to in ſetting well-written recitative, the muſical compoſer could not fail of producing an effect; to which the ear of an Engliſh audience is at preſent a ſtranger. The Italians are in ſome degree accuſtomed to it: and yet Metaſtaſio declares that his Operas are much better received in all parts of Italy, when they are ſimply declaimed than when they are ſung in air or recitative. Metaſtaſio therefore, in giving the preference to poetical over muſical expreſſion, muſt include under the former that of oratorial declamation too, and not confine it to the futile and arbitrary modes of modern verſification. It would be paying a bad compliment to muſick, as a ſcience, to give the preference in point of harmony to the mere effect of verſification, even were the modern equal to the ancient: a conſideration that ſerves to prove what has been before obſerved, that the poetical expreſſion, which had ſo wonderful an effect among the Greeks when aſſiſted by muſick, was of the oratorial torial or declamatory kind: with which the arbitrary trammels of verſification in every language muſt be in ſome degree incompatible.

In the compoſition of airs, it is true, the difference between the poetical and muſical ſubject is ſo great; that the moſt inventive and judicious compoſer will be frequently obliged to ſacrifice ſenſe to ſound; but I am convinced that a ſenſible compoſer might greatly improve our recitative; by giving it almoſt all the propriety of oratorial declamation.

That this might in part alſo be given to airs, if the poet would attend to a proper choice of words, is not to be queſtioned: the copiouſneſs and variety of our language being ſuch, that, altho moſt of the words derived from the Teutonic ſtock are harſh and unmuſical, we have a multiplicity of others ſufficiently fluent and harmonious.

Were the ſubject practically underſtood, I ſhould make no doubt that the joint endeavours of the poet and compoſer, might give us an Engliſh ſpecimen of vocal muſick, little, if any thing, inferior to the boaſted productions of the ancient Greeks; among whom, it is preſumed, the true ſimplicity of vocal melody, with perhaps, ſome mixture of plain unperplexed harmony, ſeems to have been that magic ſpell, which ſo powerfully inchanted every hearer.*

CONCLUSION.

I had an intention to have added to the foregoing grammar of ſpeech, a grammar of the Engliſh language, as it is written: in which I propoſed to lay down ſome rules for correctneſs of ſtile and elegance of compoſition, not yet ſufficiently illuſtrated by grammarians: but my enquiry into this ſubject having led me into a wide field of inveſtigation, productive of a greater number of obſervations than I can readily digeſt into theory; I am under the neceſſity, from the ſolicitude of the proprietors for the ſpeedy appearance of this work, to defer their publication to another opportunity.

A RHETORICAL
ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

A, The firſt letter in the Engliſh alphabet. It is uſed to expreſs no leſs than five diſtinct ſounds, as in the words, hat, hate, hard, what, ball.

A, an article ſet before nouns of the ſingular number; as a man, a tree; denoting the number one; or an indefinite indication, as, a man comes this way; that is, any man.

A—A, is ſometimes a noun; as, a great A, a little a.—A, is placed before a participle; and is conſidered by ſome as a contraction of at, when it is put before a word denoting ſome action not yet finiſhed; as, I am a going.—A, has alſo a peculiar ſignification, denoting the proportion of one thing to another. Thus we ſay, The landlord hath a hundred a year; The ſhip's crew gained a thouſand pounds a man.—A, in compoſition, ſeems to have ſometimes the power of the French a in theſe phraſes, a droit, a gauge, &c. and ſometimes to be contracted from at; as aſide, aſlope, afoot, aſleep, athirſt, aware. Sometimes it means in, as abed.—A, AB, and ABS, are frequently inſeparable prepoſitions to words ſignificant of ſeparation, renouncing, &c.—A, is alſo ſometimes redundant; as, ariſe, arouſe, awake; the ſame with riſe, rouſe, wake.

ABA'FT—AB-AFT. adv. [of abaftan, Sax. Behind.] From the fore-part of the ſhip; towards the ſtern.

To ABA'NDON—A-BAND-ON. v. a. [Fr. abandonner.] To reſign, give up, or quit.—To forſake; generally with a view to an ill ſenſe.

ABA'NDONED. particip. adj. Deſerted, forſaken.—Corrupted in the higheſt degree.—Given up to wickedneſs.

ABA'NDONING. [A verbal noun from abandon.] Deſertion, forſaking.

To ABA'SE—A-BASE, v. a. [Fr. abaiſſer.] To caſt down, to depreſs; generally uſed in a figurative and perſonal ſenſe.

ABA'SEMENT. n. ſ. Depreſſion; the act of bringing low.

To ABA'SH—A-BASH. v. a. [See BASHFUL.] To put into ſudden confuſion; to make aſhamed.

To ABA'TE—A-BATE. v. a. [from the French abbatre, to beat down.] To diminiſh; to leſſen.—To deject, or depreſs the mind.—To let down the price in ſelling, and ſometimes to beat down the price in buying.

To ABA'TE. v. n. To grow leſs; as, his paſſion abates; the ſtorm abates. It is uſed ſometimes with the particle of before the thing leſſened.

ABA'TEMENT. n. ſ. [abatement, Fr.] The act and ſtate of leſſening, or being leſſened.—The ſum or quantity taken away by the act of abating.—Alſo, the cauſe of abating; extenuation.

A'BBACY—AB-BA-CY. n. ſ. [Lat. abbatia.] The rights or privileges of an abbot.

A'BBESS—AB-BESS. n. ſ. [Lat. abbatiſſa,] Abbateſs, and by contraction abbeſſe in Fr. and abbeſs, Eng.] The ſuperiour or governeſs of a nunnery or monaſtery of women.

A'BBEY, or ABBY—AB-BY. n. ſ. [Lat. abbatia; from whence probably firſt ABBACY; which ſee.] A monaſtery of religious perſons, whether men or women; diſtinguiſhed from religious houſes of other denominations by larger privileges.

A'BBEY-LU'BBER, n. ſ. [See LUBBER.] A ſlothful loiterer in a religious houſe, under pretence of retirement and auſterity.

A'BBOT—AB-BOT, n. ſ. The chief of a convent, or fellowſhip of canons. See ABBEY.

To A'BBRE'VIATE—AB-BRE-VI-ATE. v. a. [Lat. abbreviare.] To ſhorten by contraction of parts.—Alſo to cut ſhort.

A'BBREVIA'TION—AB-BRE-VI-A-TION, n. ſ. The act of ſhortening.—The means uſed to ſhorten.

A'BBRE'VIATURE—AB-BRE-VI-A-TURE, n. ſ. [abbreviatura, Lat.] A compendium or abridgement.—A mark uſed for the ſake of ſhortening.

To A'BDIC'ATE—AB-DI-CATE. v. a. [Lat. abdico.] To give up one's right; to reſign; to lay down an office.

A'BDICA'TION—AB-DI-CA-TION, n. ſ. [abdicatio, Lat.]

The act of abdicating; resignation; quitting an office by one's own proper act before the usual or stated expiration.

ABE'D — A-BED. adv. [from a, for at. See (A,) and BED.] In bed.

A'BE'RRANCE — AB-ER-RANCE, a tendency to deviate from the common track.

A'BE'RRANCY. The same with ABERRANCE.

A'BERRA'TION — AB-ER-RA-TION. n. s. [from aberratio, Lat.] The act of deviating from the common track.

To ABE'T — A-BET. v. a. [from betan, Sax. signifying to excite or animate.] To push another forward; to support him in his designs by connivance, encouragement, or help. It is generally used in an ill sense.

ABE'TTER, or ABE'TTOR — A-BET-TER. n. s. He that abets; the supporter or encourager of another; chiefly in doing something ill.

To ABHO'R — AB-HOR. v. a. [abhorreo, Lat.] To hate; to detest extremely.

ABHO'RRENCE — AB-HOR-RENCE. n. s. [from abhor.] Detestation; the act of abhorring; also, the disposition to abhor.

ABHO'RRENCY. n. s. the same with ABHORRENCE.

ABHO'RRENT — AB-HOR-RENT. adj. [from abhor.] Struck with abhorrence. — Contrary to, inconsistent with. It is used with the particles from or to, but more properly with from.

To ABI'DE — A-BIDE. v. n. I abode or abid. [from bidan, Sax.] To dwell in a place. — To continue in the same state. — To wait for, expect, attend, wait upon, await; used of things prepared for persons as well as of persons expecting things. — To bear or support the consequences of a thing. — To suffer. — It is used with the particle with before a person, and at or in before a place.

A'BJECT — AB-JECT. adj. [abjectus, Lat. thrown away as of no value.] Mean, or worthless; spoken of persons. — Contemptible, or of no value; used of things. — Hopeless; used of condition. — Destitute, mean and despicable; used of actions.

ABJE'CTION — AB-JEC-TION, n. s. [from abject.] Want of spirit; servility; baseness.

A'BJECTLY. adv. [from abject.] Meanly; basely; servilely; contemptibly.

A'BJECTNESS. n. s. [from abject.] the same with abjection; servility; meanness.

ABI'LITY — A-BIL-I-TY, n. s. [Habileté, Fr.] capacity. — The power to do any thing, whether depending upon skill, or riches, or strength, or any other quality. — In the plural number, it frequently signifies the faculties or powers of the mind, and sometimes the force of understanding given by nature; as distinguished from acquired qualifications.

To ABJU'RE — AB-JURE, v. a. [abjuro, Lat.] To cast off upon oath; to swear not to do something. — To retract, or recant, a position upon oath.

A'BJURA'TION — AB-JU-RA-TION. n. s. [from abjure.] The act of abjuring. The oath taken for that end.

A'BLATIVE — AB-LA-TIVE. n. a. [ablativus, Lat.] That which takes away. It is used only in grammar.

A'BLE — A-BLE. adj. [habile, Fr. habilis, Lat. skilful, ready.] Having strong faculties, or great power of mind, body, or fortune. — Having power sufficient; enabled. — Before a verb with the particle to, it signifies generally having the power; before a noun, with for, it means qualified.
